and grace, which believers derive continually from the renewed unction of the Holy Spirit. (Notes, xxxiii. 5, 6. xlv. 6, 7. Is. xl. 27-34. 2 Cor. i. 21, 22. 1 John ii. 20-25. 26-29.)

V. 11. The words "my desire" are not in the original, or in several versions ancient and modern: and the passage might better be read without them, "Mine eye shall behold mine enemies, and mine ears shall hear of the wicked that rise up against me." (Notes, xxxvii. 34. liv. 7. lix. 10. xci. 3-9.) The psalmist indeed foresaw their dreadful doom, but it does not follow that he desired it.

V. 12. The palm-tree spreads its branches very wide, and grows to a vast size; and affords a refreshing shade to travellers. It also bears dates, a most grateful fruit in those countries, and is in every way a most beautiful tree, and an invaluable treasure to the inhabitants.—The cedar grows immensely large, and flourishes for ages, and when cut down, its valuable timber is exceedingly durable. These trees, compared with the gaudy withering grass, mark and illustrate very forcibly indeed, the difference, in character and condition, betwixt the prosperous wicked man and the true believer. (Notes, 6, 7. civ. 16. Hos. xiv. 4-8.)

V. 13-15. All holiness and spiritual consolation are derived from the fullness of Christ, through the ordinances of his appointment. The grace which teaches sinners to love, and frequent, those ordinances, in order to obtain these spiritual blessings, "plants" them, as "trees of righteousness," in the courts of the Lord. (Note, Is. lxi. 1-3.) Others, who attend, are only withering branches: but these take root, and derive nourishment from Christ; they grow and flourish, and bear fruit, and are often most eminent, in grace and usefulness to others, even amidst the infirmities of old age. (Notes, i. 1-3. lxxi. 17, 18. Jer. xvii. 5-8. John xv. 1-8. Eph. iii. 14-19.) This is ordered on purpose to shew that the Lord does indeed fulfil his covenant-engagements to all, who truly make him the foundation of their hope, and the rock of their salvation, (as the psalmist did;) and is an earnest, that he will also perform to them his promise of giving them eternal life. For "there is no unrighteousness," or fraud, in him: and though his promises were all made of mere grace and mercy; yet being made, it would not consist with the perfection of his righteousness, in any measure to fail in the performance of them. (Marg. Ref.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

To praise the Lord Most High, and give thanks unto his name, is not only our bounden duty and reasonable service; but it is a most profitable, delightful, and honourable employment, by which we emulate the work of angels, and anticipate the joys of heaven. Yet, whilst we live upon his bounty, and daily experience his lovingkindness and faithfulness, how backward are we in rendering this reasonable and pleasant tribute! We should then stir up ourselves, and all around us, to join in his praises: and as his truth and mercies are renewed to us, by day and by night, we should at least every morning and evening adore his condescension and goodness, and give him thanks for all his benefits; employing every means of rendering the service as solemn and affecting as we can. But on his own day, which we should "remember to keep holy," how ought we to abound in praise, in secret, in our families, with our friends, and in the great congregation!—For, however glorious the works of God in creation and providence are in themselves, or however liberally we are supplied with temporal benefits: none of his operations could give us sinners cause of joy and triumph in him, if it were not for that great work, on this day especially commemorated by Christians; when He, who "died for our sins, was raised again for our justification." And if distant views of this great deliverer, so animated the praises of ancient believers; how should we abound in these expressions of exulting gratitude, who enjoy the meridian light of this "Sun of righteousness," which kings, prophets, and righteous men so long desired to see! (Notes, Matt. xii. 16, 17. Luke x. 23, 24.) Well may we say, on contemplating the mysteries of redemption, "O Lord, how great are thy works, and thy thoughts are very deep!" For in them angels and archangels behold and adore the manifold wisdom and love of God. (Notes, Eph. iii. 9-12. 1 Pet. i. 10-12.) But how many, who are called Christians, in the arrogant

PSALM XCIV.

The psalmist calls on God to take vengeance on the persecutors of his church, 1-4. He complains of their cruelty and impiety, and sharply reproves their atheistical folly, 5-11. He shews the benefits of affliction, attended by divine teaching; and the security of God's people, 12-15. He calls for helpers against evil-doers; declares his experience of God's goodness, and foretells the destruction of persecutors, 16-23.

But he who at first set bounds to the proud ocean; who drove back the waters of the deluge to their ancient channel; who divided the Red Sea and Jordan for his people to pass through; who “walked on the waves of the sea,” and “rebuked the winds and waves, saying, Peace, be still, and there was a great calm;” is higher and more powerful than all “the floods of ungodly men,” who rage against him and his people; as well as “mightier than the noise of many waters,” &c. V. 5. Revealed truth, and the promises grounded on it, are 'the testimonies of God,' which "are very sure," and can never fail. (Notes, xix. 7—11. cxix. 111. 129. Is. viii. 20. 1 John v. 9—12.) These ensure the safety of the church, and the salvation of each believer. In these testimonies, and his faithfulness to them, God shews his own holiness; and it becomes, or is the ornament and beauty of all who belong to his family, to resemble and imitate him in holiness. (Notes, Lev. x. 3. xxi. 6—8. xxxiii. 8. Is. lii. 11, 12. Ez. xlv. 7—14. 1 Pet. i. 13—16. ii. 9, 10.) 'Sacred and inviolable is the word of our King; sacred and inviolable should be the loyalty of his subjects.' (Bp. Horne.)

NOTES.

JEHOVAH might have determined to shew his justice, holiness, and awful power alone, in his dealings with the inhabitants of this revolted province of his universal kingdom. But he hath been pleased to make choice of fallen men, for the display of the riches of his mercy, and of the power of his renewing grace. In effecting this great design, the Father hath "given all power in heaven and earth" to his only begotten Son, "the second Adam, the Lord from heaven," (Notes, 1 Cor. xv. 20—28. 45—49,) who, by his humiliation and sufferings, hath made atonement for our sins and purchased our salvation. "He is able to save to the uttermost all those, who come to God by him;" and can not only pardon, but deliver, uphold, and protect all who trust in him. The combined legions of evil spirits and ungodly men, do indeed furiously threaten and assault his kingdom on earth, as the tempestuous waves once did the bark in which Jesus sailed. But he needeth only to arise, and speak with authority, and they will tremble, and desist; as knowing that "the LORD on high is mightier" than they all. Whilst "his sure testimony" engages his protection to his church, his true disciples have nothing to fear. But we should all carefully enquire whether his kingdom have indeed been set up in our hearts. This will best be decided by examining, whether we so believe his testimonies, and depend on him for salvation, as to be led to love and follow after that holiness, which his precepts command and his example displays, which becometh all who profess the truth, and is bestowed on all his real servants, in a measure on earth, and completely in heaven for ever.

NOTES.

PSALM XCIV. v. 1—7. The writer of this psalm is not known; and though some parts of it answer very well to the conduct of Saul and his courtiers, especially in the slaughter, not only of the priests, but of their widows and fatherless children, and also that of the offending Gibeonites, (5, 6. Notes, 1 Sam. xxii. 17—19. 2 Sam. xxi. 1—3;) yet it might equally suit many other corrupt times of the Jewish church, and of the Christian also.—Whatever persecutions, cruelties, and iniquities, the psalmist and his pious friends experienced or witnessed, they did not consider themselves as allowed to execute vengeance: but they called on “the God of revenges,” (to whom it belonged to punish criminals and defend his people,) to appear in glory and majesty, and to recompense the blasphemies and proud boastings of their haughty persecutors. (Notes, vii. 6, 7. Deut. xxxii. 34, 35. Is. lix. 16—19. Isa. i. 1—6. Rom. xii. 17—21. Heb. x. 28—31. Rev. vi. 9—11. xviii. 11—20. xix. 1—6.) They were grieved and distressed, and thought it long, while they were compelled to hear and witness such triumphs and revilings of ungodly men, and to understand how they encouraged themselves in their detestable cruelties by atheistical principles. (Notes, lxxiv. 10, 11. lxxxix. lxxxix. 46—48.) The last verses are future in the original, and in several versions, and may be thus explained: 'Unless thou appear to execute vengeance, they will entirely crush thy people, and reduce thy heritage, the nation of Israel, to the deepest misery; for they are direct atheists, or at least they do not believe that God at all beholds, or regards, the actions of men, or will call them to account for any part of their conduct.' 'They say, JAH shall not see.' (Notes. lxviii. 4.)—'Seeing the church was then so sorely oppressed, it ought not to appear strange to us, if we see it so now: and therefore we must call on God to take our cause in hand.' (Marg. Ref. Notes, x. 2-13. lix. 7.)

V. 8, 9. (Notes, xlix. 10. xcii. 6. 7. Marg. Ref.) 'Shall he not hear your blasphemies, who gave you the faculty of hearing? Shall he not see all you do, who gave you the power of seeing? Is it possible he should give to others what he wants himself?' (Bp. Patrick.) (Note, Prov. xx. 12.)—'The psalmist uses the word planted to describe the situation of the ear; and the word formed, to denote the structure of the eye.—The mechanism of the ear is like a root planted in the earth, and concealed from view; whereas the ball of the eye is prominent on the face, and presented to general observation.' (Hervey.)

V. 10, 11. The word rendered 'chastise', generally implies force, constraint, punishment, or even binding; whereas that translated 'correct', denotes milder and gentler discipline and instruction.—'If God punish whole nations for their sins, it is mere folly for any one man, or else a few, to think that God will spare them.' (Note, ix. 17.) He first taught Adam in Paradise, and since the fall has in various ways taught his posterity, all the useful knowledge they possess; even those who abuse their talents in rebellion against him: and is not he himself omniscient, as well as omnipotent? (Marg. Ref.) But he well knows the emptiness and presumption of the thoughts, reasonings, speculations, and imaginations of apostate men, even of the very wisest and most ingenious of them: and how worthless, pernicious, and false they are. (Notes, xlix. 10-13. Rom. i. 21-23. 1 Cor. iii. 18-23.)

V. 12-14. (Notes, i. 1-3. xxxii. 1, 2. Job v. 17. Matt. v. 3-12. Heb. xii. 5-13.) 'Not he that prospers in wickedness is happy, but he, whom thou chastenest, O LORD, when he doeth amiss; and thereby teachest to study and obey thy law with greater care and diligence; which will quiet his mind under all his troubles, and at last procure the removal of them; when absolute ruin, meantime, is preparing for the ungodly.' (Bp. Patrick.) 'The sharpest correction, by which God leads men to search, believe, and obey his word, are inestimable benefits; persecutors and tyrants often are the instruments of this salutary correction to the chosen tribes of God; the persecuted and oppressed, not the persecutors and oppressors, are the happy persons: they will have rest, when the day of vengeance overwhelms the wicked.' (Notes, 2 Thes. i. 5-10. Marg. Ref.) God may indeed let his people endure sharp and tedious sufferings, but he <sup>'will</sup> never leave, nor ever forsake, them.' (Notes, xxxvii. 27, 28. 1 Sam. xii. 22. John x. 26-30.) 'Therefore they may boldly say, The LORD is my helper, I will not fear what man can do unto me.' (Note, Heb. xiii. 5, 6.)

V. 15. When iniquity triumphs, judgment seems to decline from righteousness: but when the LORD executeth vengeance on the wicked, and delivers his people, then 'judgment returns to righteousness.' This the upright in heart confidently expect; and therefore they adhere to the cause of piety, and continue to wait upon God in the midst of all discouragements. (Notes, xxxviii. 5-8. 34. Jam. v. 7-11. Marg. Ref.)

V. 16-18. It is probable that the psalmist had expected, that many would have joined him in withstanding the oppression to which he was exposed, and which was the common cause of the nation, and that he called on them for that purpose. (Notes, Ex. ii. 11-15. xxxii. 26-29. Acts vii. 17-29.) But when he found himself disappointed, he was ready to give up all for lost; and had not God been his helper, he must soon have been laid in the silent grave. His experience, however, did not accord to his fears; for when he was falling, his merciful God upheld him.—When our LORD entered on his last scene of sufferings, he called on his disciples to watch with him one hour; but he called in vain. They first slept, and then all forsook him and fled. (Notes, Matt. xxvi.

40-56.) Yet he was carried through, and advanced to the throne of glory: and David's case was but a feeble shadow of Christ's, either in his humiliation or exaltation. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 19. The thoughts, contrivances, anxieties, and perplexities of the psalmist's mind, seem to be here represented by the intricacies of a thicket, or labyrinth, from which there seems to be no way of escape; (for this is the import of the original word;) but communion with God, and the consolations of his Spirit, so filled his heart with joy and gladness, as to raise him above them all. (Notes, xlii. 4-11. lxxiii. 3-13.)

V. 20, 21. The evident injustice, oppression, and fraud of persecuting rulers, who perhaps at the same time pretend zeal for the honour of God, form an encouragement to the persecuted; for it is certain that the righteous LORD will have no fellowship with such workers of iniquity under the colour of law and justice, and will give no countenance to them, however for a time he may permit them to escape with impunity.—Righteousness and innocence are most atrocious crimes in the eyes of wickedness and guilt. For these crimes Cain slew his brother Abel; the Jews crucified Christ; the pagans tortured and murdered his disciples; and bad men in all ages have persecuted the good. 'Marvel not, my brethren, if the world hate you.' (Bp. Horne.)—The narrative, in the New Testament, of the chief priests, scribes, elders, and people of Israel, with Pilate and his soldiers, and the Roman power, all collected against the innocent and righteous Saviour, fully answers to this description: and it is hardly possible to think, that the Holy Spirit did not intend those events, whatever occasioned the psalmist thus to express himself. (Note, lviii. 1, 2.)—The words righteous and innocent are in the singular number: and the Jews themselves allow, that this psalm relates to the Messiah's kingdom. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 22, 23. (Notes, vii. 8-11. xxvii. 1-3. 2 Tim. iv. 16-18.) The nation of the Jews, (speaking by their rulers, teachers, and priests, and the congregation assembled at Jerusalem to keep the passover,) when demanding the crucifixion of Christ, vehemently exclaimed, 'His blood be on us and on our children:' and the destruction of Jerusalem with unexampled slaughter, and the state of the Jews ever since, form an example of the manner in which God brings on persecutors 'their own iniquity, and cuts them off in their own wickedness;' indeed, those events seem to have been expressly foretold. (Notes, ix. 15, 16. Esth. vii. 10. Dan. ix. 25-27. Matt. xxvii. 24, 25.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1-11. They, who suppose that the exuberant goodness and mercy of God are inconsistent with the exercise of rigorous justice, and with the infliction of vengeance on the wicked; must certainly have formed very erroneous conceptions of this character; for he is indeed 'a God of revenges.' (Marg.) 'Vengeance belongs to him' alone, except as he delegates others to be his executioners of it; (Note, Rom. xiii. 3-5;) and they who have seen his 'glory in the face of Jesus Christ,' readily perceive the most perfect harmony betwixt his justice and mercy; while others are 'blinded by the god of this world,' whatever wisdom they seem to possess, or have the reputation of. (Notes, 2 Cor. iv. 4-6.) We should however remember, that vengeance does not belong to us; and therefore we must 'render to no man evil for evil,' but leave our cause with the Judge of all the earth. Under oppression and persecution we should beg of him to 'shine forth,' and shew himself, and to render a reward to the proud and ungodly: not so much, that we may be freed from suffering; as that we may not be grieved by beholding the triumphs, and hearing the slanders, blasphemies, and boastings, of the workers of iniquity.—It is most horrible wickedness in any case to 'murder the widow, the stranger, and the fatherless:' but when these are the LORD's heritage, his chosen people, who are broken in pieces and butchered for his sake, the impiety becomes still more atrocious; and the pious spectator must needs be filled with the deepest sorrow and indignation. Such wretches, as commit these daring crimes, cannot believe that there is a God, or that he sees, and will call them to an account,

B. C. 1045.

An exhortation to praise God, the rock of our salvation, for his greatness, as the Creator of the world, 1-6: to worship him, as his creatures, and his peculiar people, 6-7: and a solemn warning not to tempt him, as Israel did in the wilderness, 8-11.

O COME, let us sing unto the LORD: let us make a joyful noise to the rock of our salvation.

2 Let us come before his presence with thanksgiving, and make a joyful noise unto him with psalms.

3 For the LORD is a great God, and a great king above all gods.

4 In this hand are the deep places of the earth: the strength of the hills is his also.

5 The sea is his, and he made it: and his hands formed the dry land.

6 O come, let us worship and bow down: let us kneel before the LORD our maker.

7 For he is our God; and we are the people of his pasture, and the sheep of his hand. To-day, ye will hear his voice,

8 Harden not your heart, as in the provocation, and as in the day of temptation in the wilderness:

9 When your fathers tempted me, proved me, and saw my work.

10 Forty years long was I grieved with this generation, and said, It is a people that do err in their heart, and they have not known my ways:

11 Unto whom I sware in my wrath, that they should not enter into my rest.

for their conduct: and indeed infidelity and atheism are the proper attendants on injustice and cruelty. But the Christian, whilst, in earnestly pleading for the deliverance of the church, he must request the ruin of all her enemies, if they continue implacable, would still be far more gratified with their conversion. He will therefore pray that this change may take place: and with boldness and meekness, as he hath opportunity, he will expostulate with them on the brutish folly of their principles and conduct.—It would not be credible, if it were not undeniable, that millions of rational creatures should live, move, speak, hear, understand, remember, will, and effect their purposes; and yet discourse and behave, as if they verily believed, that the God, from whom they derive all these capacities, could neither see, nor hear, nor understand, and would never punish their rebellious abuse of them! But they will find, that JEHOVAH is the fountain of knowledge, wisdom, and power, as well as of goodness and justice: and he will shew them, that he was acquainted with the secret thoughts of their hearts; which are equally unreasonable and wicked, and are sure to terminate in vexation, if not in destruction. We may therefore conclude, without hesitation, that the most afflicted believer is happier than the most prosperous of the ungodly. (Notes, Luke xvi. 19—26. P. O.)

V. 12—23. Afflictions are frequently the means of bringing sinners to repentance, and faith in the Saviour: and every man should think himself happy, who, being chastened of the Lord, is under the correction taught his truths and will, from the sacred word, and by the Holy Spirit. For he will find rest to his soul under adversities, and at length rest from them; and the wicked will harass him only, till the pit be prepared, into which they shall sink and rise no more for ever. Let not then the upright in heart fear, lest the Lord should cast off his people: let them still cleave to him, and follow after righteousness; and at length the just Judge will terminate the triumphs of his enemies, and the sorrows of his servants. We should, according to our station in the church or in society, endeavour to unite all around us, in attempting to stem the torrent of impiety; but we need not wonder, if we find the remnant of believers timid and inactive in proportion as the wicked are daring and enterprising. Yet we must bear our testimony to the truth, and use our endeavours to serve the cause of godliness, though it be alone, and in sackcloth: and the Lord will help and protect us, till our testimony be finished; let who will attempt to silence us, by terror, or in a dungeon, or in the grave. But unless he uphold us, our feet will slip: and if we have been preserved from falling into sin, or shrinking from our duty, on trying occasions, we should give him the glory, and encourage our brethren.—When urgent difficulties press upon our minds, respecting our own case, or the cause of God, multitudes of thoughts, contrivances, and apprehensions will arise within us; the indulgence of which only increases vexations, solicitude, or distrust, and renders our views more gloomy and desponding. Then should we retire, and spread the case before the Lord, and pour out our hearts unto him: thus we shall find light arise in the midst of our darkness; and divine consolations will often not only satisfy and calm, but, even delight our souls.—The believer needs not be anxious about the event, either to himself, or to the church: though he should see those in authority, who frame mischief in enacting persecuting laws, and multitudes “gathering themselves together against the soul of the righteous, to condemn the innocent blood.” The righteous Lord may indeed for a while bear with, but he will never patronize, “the throne of iniquity:” and whilst he defends his cause, and is the rock and refuge of every saint, he will bring upon their haughtiest enemies “their own iniquity, and cut them off in their own wickedness; yea, the LORD our God shall cut them off.” May we then join and adhere to that party, which is sure at length to prevail for evermore.

NOTES.

PSALM XCV. V. 1. This psalm has no title in the Hebrew: but the Septuagint calls it ‘A psalm of David;’ and the apostle sanctions this testimony, by his manner of quoting it, “Wherefore as the Holy Ghost saith,” &c. “Again he limiteth a certain day, saying in David,” or “by David.” (Notes, Heb. iii. 7—13. iv. 3—11.) This passage also manifestly shews, that the apostles considered the Jewish Scriptures as the language of the Holy Spirit, whoever committed that language to writing. The Holy Ghost spake by David. (Notes, Matt. xxii. 41—46. Mark xvi. 35—37.) The psalm appears to have been composed for the use of the Israelites, as they ascended in companies to the sanctuary, or as soon as they entered into the courts of the Lord; being an introduction to the sacred services there performed, and especially the psalmody, which had recently been instituted. And it is still retained in the offices of our church for similar purposes.—The psalmist ‘sheweth that God’s service standeth not in dead ceremonies, but in the sacrifice of praise and thanksgiving.’ (Notes, 1. 7—15.)—Rock of our salvation. (Marg. Ref. Notes, Ex. xvii. 5, 6. lxxxix. 19—37. Is. xii. 2.)

V. 2. “We will come,” &c. (Marg. and Marg. Ref.) V. 3. Gods. ‘Even the angels (who in respect of men are thought as gods) are nothing in his sight; much less the idols which man’s brain inventeth.’ (Notes, lxxx. 1. 6—8. xlvii. 3—7. cxxxviii. 1. Heb. i. 5—7.)

V. 4, 5. The recesses of the earth, which man cannot penetrate or investigate, are in the hand, and open to the inspection, of the Creator.—The word rendered “strength,” and in the margin heights, is derived from a root signifying to weary; because men are wearied in ascending the heights of the mountains.—The treasures which lie hid in the deep places of the earth beneath; the majestic pride and strength of the hills, which tower above and lift up their heads to heaven; the unnumbered waves of the great and wide sea, which roll in perpetual motion round the world; the rich and variegated produce of the dry land, crowned with verdure and beauty; together with every thing that liveth in the waters and on the earth, are all under the government of our Lord.’ (Bp. Horne.) (Marg. Ref. Notes, xcii. 3, 4.)

V. 6. The former verses were intended to animate the people in joyful praise and thanksgiving; but this seems a call to humble prayer and supplication.—‘Since God made our bodies, as well as our souls, it is meet and right that they should bear their part in his service, and that internal worship should be accompanied and signified by that which is external.’ (Bp. Horne.)—Three words are used: “We will prostrate ourselves, we will bow our heads, we will kneel,” &c. (Notes, Gen. xvii. 1—3. 1 Kings viii. 22.)—Kneeling is the posture of prayer most commonly mentioned, both in the Old and New Testament. (Marg. Ref. Notes, Dan. vi. 10, 11. Acts xxi. 1—6.)

V. 7. (Notes, Ex. ix. 5, 6. xx. 2.)—The Creator of the world became the God, or the covenanted friend of Israel, and the nation was under special obligations to devote themselves to his worship and service, being taken peculiar care of by him, and favoured with manifold advantages above all other nations. They were “his people and the sheep of his pasture.” (Notes, xxxiii. 1—3. lxxx. 1.) Yet this was only an outward relation and privilege to most of them; the whole company were a kind of type of the true Israel; and nations professing Christianity are in great measure in a similar situation. Now, in large congregations, some may be supposed to be spiritual worshippers; and others to be destitute of saving and sanctifying faith, though attending on the means of grace. The former part of the psalm, therefore, is an address to the true worshippers, exciting them to alacrity and fervency in their spiritual sacrifices: but the latter part of it, is a warning to the unbelievers, from the example of the Israelites, in the days of Moses; and the apostle hath taught us to apply it to the case of professed Christians, and to that of all who hear the gospel. If they ever mean to hear, that is, to believe and obey, the voice of God, let them lose no time, but attend without delay; lest the sentence of exclusion should be past, and the door be for ever shut.—‘He sheweth wherein they are God’s flock, that is, if they hear his voice.’ (Notes, 1 Cor. x. 1—12. Heb. iii. 7—13. Jude 5—8. Marg. Ref.)

V. 8. Harden, &c. (Notes, Ex. vi. 21. ix. 12. Is. vi. 9, 10.) The original words for “provocation and temptation,” are Meribah and Massah. (Notes, Ex. xvii. 7. Num. xx. 10—13.)

V. 9—11. (Notes, Num. xiv. 22, 23. Matt. iv. 5—7.)—The word, translated “grieved,” is rendered in the Septuagint, provoked; and the apostle hath followed that reading, though our version retains the word grieved. Some versions render it, ‘I held them in abhorrence.’—It is certainly a much more indignant word, so to speak, than that used by the apostle, when he says, “Grieve not the Holy Spirit,” &c.; (Note, Eph. iv. 30—32.) for he is speaking of the wrong tempers and other failures of true Christians; but the psalmist, or rather the Holy Spirit by him, refers to the obstinate, incorrigible unbelief and rebellion of that generation which fell in the wilderness, after all which they had seen and heard of JEHOVAH’s power, majesty, and goodness. “They rebelled, and vexed his Holy Spirit: therefore he was turned to be their enemy, and fought against them.” (Notes, Is. lxiii. 10. Acts vii. 51—53.) The root of all this rebellion lay in their hearts; they “erred,” or wandered, in their hearts; they were influenced by “an evil heart of unbelief, in departing from the living God.” They were apostates and idolaters: they disliked the holy service

PSALM XCVII.

The nations are called on to rejoice in the coming of the righteous kingdom of God, and in the subversion of idolatry, 1-7. The church rejoices because of his judgments, and in his universal sovereignty, 8, 9. An exhortation to holiness, and joy in God, 10-12.

3 'A fire goeth before him, and burneth up his and kingdom of the Saviour; but they are more literally rendered as a direct prediction: "Then the heavens shall rejoice, and the earth shall be glad; the sea shall roar." &c. (Notes, xcvi. 7—9. cxlviii. 7—14. 1 Chr. xvi. 31—34. 1 xlii. 10—12. xliv. 23. lv. 12, 13.) The second coming of Christ, as well as the first, seems predicted, when "the creature," or creation, "shall be delivered from the bondage of corruption, into the glorious liberty of the sons of God." (Note, Rom. viii. 19—23.)—The kingdom of the Redeemer is the kingdom of righteousness and truth: he rules the world in equity, justice, and truth; he fulfils the gracious promises to his believing people: and the triumph of righteousness and truth, over wickedness and falsehood, is the certain effect. And when he shall come to judge the world, the justice and truth of God will be revealed, and glorified, in the destruction of the wicked according to his threatenings; and the faithfulness of God, in fulfilling his largest and kindest promises to his devoted servants. (Notes, Ps. i. 3—6. 2 Thess. i. 5—10. Rev. xx. 11—15.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

When our Emmanuel had finished his work on earth, and was received to his glory in heaven, the church began to “sing a new song” unto him, and to bless his name; and his apostles and evangelists lost no time, but proclaimed the glad tidings of his salvation; so that “daily in the temple, and from house to house, they ceased not to teach and to preach Jesus Christ;” and soon they began to declare his “glory among the heathen, and his wonders among all people.” His honour and majesty, his strength and excellency, were so displayed at that time, in his doctrine and by his miracles, that vast multitudes renounced their idols, to worship JEHOVAH in “the beauty of holiness,” as “God in Christ reconciling the world unto himself;” to “render unto him the honour due unto his name;” to bring their spiritual sacrifices, and to come into his courts. Still this salvation is spread abroad; it is said “among the heathen, that JEHOVAH reigneth;” and we are taught to hope and pray for that time, when he shall establish his kingdom in righteousness over all nations, and when the whole creation shall rejoice in him, and shew forth his praise.—At length the incarnate God will come to judge the earth, to execute his just vengeance on his enemies, and to fulfil his promises to his people.—What then are we? Would that day be welcome to our hearts? Are we prepared to join the joyful acclamations of all his servants on earth and in heaven? If this be not our case, let us now begin to prepare to meet our God, by seeking the pardon of our sins, and the renewal of our souls to holiness. If we are ready, let us bless his name, bear up cheerfully under our difficulties, endeavour to promote the peace and prosperity of his kingdom; and in our proper place, and doing our proper work, let us be as faithful servants, who are habitually expecting and desiring the coming of their Lord.

NOTES.

PSALM XCVIL. v. 1. The Septuagint entitles this 'A psalm of David, after his land was restored to him,' meaning that he composed it, when he was re-established in his government after Absalom's rebellion.—But, whatever gave occasion to it, no doubt "the Spirit of God speaking by" the psalmist, foretold the kingdom of Christ, and his victories. This verse may literally be thus rendered, "JEHOVAH reigneth, the earth shall rejoice; yea, the multitude of the isles shall be glad thereof." It is a direct prediction of the conversion of the Gentiles to Christ, and their joy in him; and the evidence from prophecy appears very much obscured, by rendering such prophecies as exhortations.—When the righteous are exhorted to rejoice in God, (12,) the imperative, not the future tense, is used. 'He sheweth that where God reigneth, there is all felicity and spiritual joy. The gospel shall not only be preached in Judea, but in all isles and countries.'—'We Britons, as inhabiting one of those heathen isles, and enjoying so fair a portion of evangelical blessings, have reason to repeat this verse with a particular pleasure and energy.—The Hebrews called by the name of isles, not only countries surrounded by the sea, but all the countries which the sea divided from them; so that the term became synonymous with the Gentiles. Thus it is said, "the isles shall wait for his law;" which is expounded as follows, "in him shall the Gentiles trust." (Is. xlii. 4. Matt. xii. 21.) (Bp. Horne).—Europe, however, and the isles between Asia and Europe, seem more generally meant by this expression. (*Notes, Gen. x. 1—5. conclusion. Is. xxiv. 13—15. xii. 10—12. lx. 8, 9. lxxi. 19—23. 8 <sup>r</sup>Zion heard, and was glad; and the daughters of Judah rejoiced, <sup>a</sup>because of thy judgments, O LORD.

thou art exalted <sup>2</sup>far above all gods.

10 'Ye that love the LORD, 'hate evil: 'he preserveth the souls of his saints; 'he delivereth them out of the hand of the wicked.

11 *Light is sown for the righteous, and gladness for the upright in heart.

V. 2. "Clouds and darkness" may either denote the terrors, with which the Lord appals his enemies, when he goes forth to execute righteous vengeance upon them; or the obscurity which rests upon his dispensations and dealings with his people, till the accomplishment of his promises and prophecies throws light upon them. (Notes, lxxvii. 19, 20. Nah. i. 2—6.) But, however it may appear in his creatures, or even to his most eminent saints, however they may be ready to say, "all these things are against me," or, "hath God forgotten to be gracious?" and, however the wicked may blasphemously revile his justice, as ungracious or cruelty; yet, righteousness and judgment are the basis, the support and establishment, "of his throne." (Notes, lxxxix. 14. xcix. 4.) His mercy-seat is founded on judgment and righteousness; the justification of the believing sinner, through the merits and atonement of Christ, magnifies the law, and honours the justice, as well as the grace of God. Every providential dispensation, whatever present appearances may be, springs from the same glorious union of justice and mercy, in the manifold wisdom and judgment, truth and faithfulness, of God. And "the day of wrath will be the revelation of the righteous judgment of God, who will render to every one according to his deeds." (Notes, Rom. ii. 4—6. iii. 21—31.)

V. 3—7. In the deep but righteous judgment of our King, Jerusalem and its inhabitants were miserably destroyed, as by a consuming fire, for their enmity to him and his kingdom. (Notes, Matt. xxii. 1—10. xxiv. 1, 2.)—The subversion of the deep-rooted foundations of idolatry, throughout the vast Roman empire, during the first three centuries; and then by the conversion of Constantine the emperor to Christianity, may next be predicted, in metaphoric language taken from the displays of the Divine power and presence at Mount Sinai. (Notes, 1. 1—6. Ex. xix. 16—20. Deut. iv. 11. v. 22—29. xxxiii. 2. Heb. xii. 18—21.) The mountainous obstructions, which before seemed to render the general spread of Christianity insurmountable, thus melted before God, like wax before the fire; (Notes, Is. lxiv. 1—3. Mic. i. 2—4.;) the devoted worshippers of idols, even the greatest of them, were alarmed as by tremendous lightnings and earthquakes. His righteousness, in the destruction of the persecuting tyrants of those times, was conspicuous as the heavens; all the people beheld the Divine glory, in making his cause triumphant; and the pagans were confounded, and ashamed of their idols, in which they had so long gloried. Not only did angels worship the exalted Redeemer, but rulers, who are the vicegerents of the great God, submitted to him, and became his subjects; and all the mighty ones of the earth bowed down before him, who had prostrated the idol-gods of the heathen by his presence and power. (Marg. Ref.)—The Septuagint renders the word translated “gods,” by angels; and thus the apostle quotes the verse, when speaking of the dignity of Christ. (Notes, xcv. 3. Heb. i. 5—7.) Hence we learn that Christ himself, as Emmanuel, is peculiarly intended. He is the object of universal adoration; and all the angels of God, (instead of receiving worship from Christians, according to the abominable idolatry of the Roman antichrist,) are fellow-worshippers with Christians, when adoring the great Redeemer.—Thus, they were, under the law, represented by the cherubim as bowing down over the ark, “desiring to look into these things;” and in many respects as joining in Israel’s worship: and thus they are introduced by John in the Revelation, as joining in the praises of the church, to “the Lamb that was slain,” &c. (Notes, Ex. xxv. 10—21. 1 Pet. i. 10—12. Rev. v. 11—14.)

V. 8, 9. (Note, xlviii. 11.) The church, and all her assemblies, hearing of these revolutions, would greatly rejoice to see the judgment of God upon his enemies, and his exaltation above all the gods of the heathen.—“There is joy in the presence of the angels of God, over one sinner that repenteth:” much more was there when the Redeemer triumphed over the idols of the heathen, and the kingdom of the devil.—Thus all the tidings brought to the apostles, concerning the conversion of the Gentiles, caused them to rejoice and glorify God. (Marg. Ref. Notes, Luke xv. 8—10. Acts xv. 1—6. xxi. 17—21. Rev. xix. 1—6.)

V. 10. 'Shew your love to the Lord, by hating and forsaking all sin.'—There is a peculiar emphasis in this caution, with reference to the events supposed to have been predicted : as it is well known, that secular prosperity soon corrupted the visible church, in a most lamentable manner, and brought an inundation of evils, which are by no means terminated at this day. Yet the souls of the faithful remnant have in every age been preserved, notwithstanding

PSALM XCVIII.

The psalmist calls on the whole world to praise the Lord, for overcoming all opposition, in making known his salvation to Israel, and to the ends of the earth, and in the prospect of his coming to judgment, 1-9.

A Psalm.

2 The LORD hath <sup>d</sup>made known his salvation; <sup>e</sup>his righteousness hath he <sup>f</sup>openly shewed in the sight of the heathen.

3 He hath <sup>g</sup>remembered his mercy and his truth toward the house of Israel: <sup>h</sup>all the ends of the earth have seen the salvation of our God.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The wise and righteous government of God is well calculated to rejoice the hearts of all rational creatures, except rebels, who have exposed themselves to his powerful vengeance: but the kingdom of JEHOVAH, as administered by the eternal Son, who hath pardons to confer on the most guilty, is a source of joy even to the sinful inhabitants of the earth. The gospel also, when preached to those who before "sat in darkness," calls for the exercise of gratitude and gladness; and this our favoured isle hath peculiar cause to be thankful: yet, alas! how few prize these privileges, or rejoice properly on account of them!—Under every dispensation, the counsels and dealings of the infinite God are too mysterious for man's comprehension: but in the event we shall see, and now we should believe, that when "clouds and darkness are round about him, righteousness and judgment are the basis of his throne."—It is, however, evident from history, that from time to time, his wrath, like a consuming fire, hath gone "before him, to burn up his enemies round about." When he comes in his power to set up his kingdom, all opposition must melt away like wax before the fire; and dismay and ruin must be the effects of obstinate rebellion against him; whilst the inhabitants of heaven will "adore his righteousness, and all the people shall see his glory." Confusion will be the portion of all those, who worship and glory in graven images; and surely this idolatry is no less criminal within, than it is without, the pale of the visible church! The destruction of the imperial authority of pagan Rome, which had for ages been employed to support idolatry, was but a prelude of the destruction of that antichristian power which soon succeeded it, but hath far exceeded it in impieties and iniquities; (Notes, 2 Thes. ii. 8-12. Rev. xviii. 4-8.) and the Lord Jesus will ere long come, and confound all idolaters throughout the earth, and put an end to idolatry of every kind.—All the angels of God worship him, we cannot therefore err in joining their adoration, and in "honouring the Son, even as we honour the Father;" (Note, John v. 20-23.) and the monarchs of the earth will never consult their own interest and honour, till they prostrate themselves before him, and use their authority in obedience to his commandments. (Note, ii. 10-12.) As these events take place, the church of God, in every land, doth greatly rejoice: nay, we cannot but be glad on account of those judgments of God upon persecuting tyrants, which promote the success of his gospel.—But if we really love the Lord, and desire that his "name should be hallowed, his kingdom come and his will done on earth as in heaven," (Note, Matt. vi. 9.) we shall in proportion hate and dread the evil of sin, and carefully watch against the commission and the occasions of it. This is the best expression of our love, and our most effectual method of forwarding those desirable events.—The remnant of upright believers shall be preserved in the worst of times; and the light of joy and consolation is sown for them, in a good soil, and will surely spring up and ripen to a glorious harvest. Let us then rejoice in the Lord, though in the world we have tribulation: let us thankfully recollect, that his purity, justice, truth, and goodness, are pledged to support and deliver all who trust in him: and, as he infinitely hates sin, yet freely loves the person of the sinner who believes in Christ; he will certainly make a final separation between the man whom he loves, and the sin which he hates, and sanctify his people wholly, in body, soul, and spirit.

NOTES.

PSALM XCVIII. V. 1. This is called A Psalm; the Septuagint adds 'of David.'—It very much resembles the ninety-sixth. It especially celebrates, prophetically, the salvation of the Redeemer, by his almighty power accomplishing his whole decrees, notwithstanding the opposition of earth and hell. (Note, xcvi. 1.) These words, rendered "gotten himself the victory," are literally, "hath saved for himself;" but in doing this he obtained the most glorious victories: and others still more glorious will at length be acquired; of which the deliverances and victories of Israel, from their departure from Egypt to the termination of the Mosaic dispensation, were but faint shadows. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 2. The salvation and righteousness of God are often united in Scripture, as shewing the way of a sinner's acceptance, "by the righteousness of our God and Saviour, Jesus Christ:" (Notes, xlv. 9. 10. li. 14. lxii. 13-15. lxxxv. 9-15. Is. xlv. 8. 20-25. xlvi. 12. 13. 1. 4-6. lxi. 10. 11. Zech. ix. 9. 10. Rom. iii. 20-26;) and these were made known, in the most public manner, to the heathen, by the preaching of the apostles. But perhaps the awful, yet righteous, vengeance executed on the Jewish nation for rejecting the gospel, while salvation was thus sent to the gentiles, and welcomed by them, was intended. Behold, therefore, the goodness and severity of God; on them that fell, severity, but on thee goodness!" (Note, Rom. xi. 22-24.)

V. 3. 'In sending the Messiah, God shewed himself mindful of his promises, which mercy prompted him to make, and truth required him to perform.' (Bp. Horne.) (Notes, xxii. 27, 28. lxvii. lxxxv. 10-13. lxxxix. 1-4. Is. xlv. 20-22. li. 9. 10. Jer. xxxiii. 14-16. Am. ix. 11. 12. Mic. vii. 18-20. Luke i. 67-75. ii. 25-32. Acts xiii. 42-48. Rom. xv. 8-13.)

V. 4-6. (Marg. Ref.) V. 7-9. (Note, xcvi. 11-13.) "The floods" and "hills," (or more literally, the rivers and mountains,) are here substituted for "the fields and the woods." The different orders of rational creatures, in the universe, seem to be poetically described under these metaphors, as rejoicing and exulting with every expression of triumph and delight in the reign of the great Messiah. Angels celebrated his birth with glad songs of triumphant praise, and fervent congratulations of man's felicity. No doubt they triumphed with joyful praise at his ascension. They rejoice over every sinner that repents; they are his "ministering spirits to the heirs of salvation;" and they will execute his sovereign decisions at the day of judgment; admiring the equity and rectitude, as well as the truth and mercy, of his whole administration. (Notes, 1 Chr. xvi. 32-34. Is. lv. 12, 13.) The passage, as before, is future, and rather a prediction, than an exhortation.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The great Redeemer, "by his right hand and his holy arm," obtained for himself here on earth most glorious victories: by his life, death, and resurrection he overcame the world, sin, Satan, and death; and by his triumphant ascension he 'opened the gates of heaven to all believers.' These are the marvellous works of JEHOVAH-JESUS, which demand from us new and perpetual songs of praise.—But we are more especially to enquire, whether his holy arm have gotten him the victory in our hearts, over the power of Satan, unbelief, and sin. If this be our happy case, we shall soon exchange all profane, light, and sensual strains, for new songs of joy and thanksgiving; and our lives will harmonize with our lips in celebrating Emmanuel's praise. To bring sinners to experience this needful change, he hath made known his salvation by the preaching of his gospel. "The ministration of condemnation" shews the justice of that sentence, which is denounced against transgressors; and "the ministration of righteousness" declares the way, in which sinners may be justified before him. Thus "his righteousness hath he shewed openly," and not by types and shadows, in the sight of the heathen: and his ministers are required to use "great plainness of speech," in warning, instructing, and inviting men to partake of these blessings.—When the Redeemer came, JEHOVAH remembered the engagements, which his mercy dictated and his truth performed, to the house of Israel: and, blessed be his name, this remote corner of the earth "hath seen the salvation of our God!" Let then his people in all lands rejoice in their Saviour and King; and let them celebrate his praises, in every way and by every means, which can express how greatly they rejoice and glory in him; how they welcome him to the throne in their hearts, delight in his pleasant service, and "find rest to their souls" by reliance upon him.—As all nature proclaims the Creator's glory, may all nations speedily resound with the Redeemer's name, whilst the blessings of his kingdom fill the earth with gladness. Yet sin in its dreadful effects will not be utterly abolished, until the Lord shall "come to judge the world in righteousness." Then this visible creation will be dissolved; and his people will enter those "new heavens, and that new earth," wherein dwelleth righteousness." "Seeing then we look for such things, let us give diligence, that we may be found of him in peace, without spot, and blameless." (Notes, 2 Pet. iii. 10-16.)

NOTES.

PSALM XCIX. V. 1-3. The Septuagint assigns this psalm also to David; it is uncertain, whether on sufficient grounds or not.—The word rendered "tremble," signifies also to rage or fret; (Note, ix. 3-5;) and being future, the opposition of the Jews and Gentiles to the establishment of Messiah's kingdom, and their furious persecutions of the church in the primitive times, seem to be predicted; as well as the consternation of the opposers; while they witnessed the success of the gospel, and saw their resources, one after another, failing them, and everything foreboding their disgrace and ruin. For it was evident that "the LORD was great in Zion, and reigning on a throne of grace," (Notes, Ex. xxv. 22. Heb. iv. 14-16. xii. 22-25. Rev. xiv. 1-5;) and was determined to effect a revolution in the moral and religious state of the world; and to shew himself "high above all people." So that nothing remained but unreserved and cordial submission; and a willing exchange of idolatry and superstition, for the spiritual worship of the awful and holy name of Israel's God.—"They shall praise," &c. (Note, cxi. 9, 10. Marg. Ref.)

V. 4. 'None can resist him; yet, he is not a king that uses his power to wrong and oppress his subjects; but to do them right, and to give them relief, in which he delights....He hath hitherto governed the seed of Israel with exact justice and singular mercy.' (Bp. Patrick.)—'Impenitent rebels must feel the weight of his arm, and none can accuse the justice of their punishment; but in all other cases, he is mighty only to save.' (Bp. Horne.) (Notes, xlv. 6, 7. lxxii. 1-6. lxxxix. 13, 14. xcvi. 13. xcvi. 1. 2. Is. ix. 6, 7. xi. 2-5. xxxiii. 1, 2. Zech. ix. 9, 10.)

V. 5. (9.) This is a call to the trembling, or raging, persecutors to submit to God, and bow to the Messiah's sceptre. (Note, ii. 10-12.) The temple, or the ark, was the footstool before which they were to prostrate themselves in humble adoration. These were typical of the person and mediation of Emmanuel. (Notes, 1 Chr. xxviii. 2. 2 Lam. ii. 1.)

V. 6. God was often so provoked at Israel, as to threaten to destroy the nation; but Moses and Aaron at one time, and Samuel at another; and in like manner the priests, and prophets, and zealous believers, in different ages, interceded; and so the nation was spared: but these were only types of that great Mediator, "who is able to save to the uttermost all them that come to God through him, seeing he ever liveth to make intercession for them." (Notes, Heb. vii. 20-25.)—The wrath of God, therefore, against the opposers of the gospel, need not drive any to despair; for He, who heard Moses, Aaron, and Samuel through the typical sacrifices, and spared Israel, would spare all who submitted, and sought mercy through the sacrifice and intercession of Christ. The same consideration was also well calculated to encourage the prayers, and supplications, of the persecuted and afflicted church. (Marg. Ref. Notes, cvi. 19-23. Ex. xxxii. 11-14. Num. xiv. 13-19. xvi. 20-22. 1 Sam. vii. 9. Jer. x. 1.)—Priests. (Notes, Ex. xxv. 5. Lev. viii. 25-32. Deut. xviii. 15-19.)

V. 7. In &c., or From "the cloudy pillar." (Notes, Ex. xix. 7-9. xxxiii. 8-11. Num. xii. 4-8.) Thus, the Lord, in a most condescending manner, made known his will to Moses and Aaron, and by them to Israel. To Samuel also he revealed himself with great clearness, though in another way; and they answered his kindness, by an habitual course of zealous obedience; so that they were both blessed and blessings to Israel. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 8. Tookest, &c. In answer to the prayers of Moses, Aaron, and Samuel, the Lord repeatedly spared the nation of Israel; yet he took vengeance on the ringleaders of rebellion among them, and he caused the people to suffer for, and even by means of, "their own inventions." (Notes, Ex. xxxii. 34, 35. Num. xiv. 22, 23, 33-45.) When Aaron burned incense between the living and the dead, the plague was stayed; yet many of the people had previously died of it. (Num. xvi. 41-50.) And when Samuel prayed for the people they were spared, but their king, whom they had sinfully desired, proved a severe scourge unto them. (1 Sam. xii. 16-23. Hos. xiii. 10, 11.)

rebels: and, as hitherto the greatest number, even of those who have heard the gospel, have continued impenitent and unbelieving, the inhabitants of the earth have abundant cause to tremble at the report of the Redeemer's absolute authority and almighty power. But he still "waiteth to be gracious;" let then all who hear, take warning, and seek his mercy.—Our God "is great in Zion, and high above all people;" and the chief of sinners may yet rejoice, and praise his great and terrible name; though "he is holy," yea, because he is holy. His power is exercised in perfect wisdom and justice; and, while he executes just punishment on his enemies, he most delighteth in shewing mercy to the humbled transgressor. As he loveth judgment and righteousness in his own administration, so he establisheth equity amongst his subjects, and requireth them to be holy, because he is holy. His worshippers must bow before him in humility and reverence, and seek conformity to him; whilst they exalt him by their adorations, and give him the glory of their salvation.—There have always, however, been many professed worshippers of God, who have neither believed his truths, nor obeyed his will; and there is so much faulty in all of us, that our persons and services might justly be rejected by him. But our prophet, and high priest, of far greater dignity than Moses, Aaron, or Samuel, who received and declared to us the will of the Father; who himself perfectly observed his testimonies and ordinances, and who "bare our sins in his own body on the tree," continually pleads for us before the throne, and prevails for our pardon and acceptance. Encouraged by these glad tidings, we may come before him and call upon his name, and expect an answer of peace; nay, our supplications for others, may be an extensive blessing to them; "for the effectual fervent prayer of a righteous man availeth much." But would we thus be heard, we must uprightly walk in all the ordinances and commandments of the Lord. And as no prayers will prevent the ruin of impenitent sinners; so believers will surely be corrected by their own inventions, when they commit iniquity, though the Saviour's intercession prevent their final condemnation. (Notes, 1 Cor. xi. 29-34. Heb. xii. 5-13. Rev. iii. 18-19.) Let us then entertain high and honourable thoughts of the LORD our God; and not only exalt him with our lips, but give him the throne in our hearts; and, whilst we worship him upon his mercy-seat, let us never forget that he is holy, and abhors hypocrisy, as much as profaneness and infidelity.

NOTES.

PSALM C. Title. 'There is no other psalm hath a like title with this, which is called "a psalm of praise;" or rather of thanksgiving, or acknowledgment of divine blessings. The Hebrews imagine that it was peculiarly appointed to be sung, when the sacrifices of thanksgiving were offered.' (Bp. Patrick.) (Notes, xvii. 17-19. Lev. vii. 12-18. Jer. xxxiii. 11. Heb. xiii. 15, 16.)

V. 1. The psalmist 'invites all the world to join with the Israelites, in the service of him, who was kind and gracious to them beyond expression. Accordingly, we Christians very properly use it, in acknowledgment of God's wonderful love to us in Christ; by whom we offer up continually spiritual sacrifices, for redeeming us by the sacrifice he made of himself; for making the world anew, and creating us again unto good works, according to his faithful promises, which we may depend on for ever.' (Bp. Patrick.)—All ye lands. (Notes, Ps. lxxvi. 1-3. cxvii. 1, 2. P. O.)

Joyful noise. The sound of the trumpets, at the beginning of the jubilee seems alluded to. (Notes, lxxxix. 15-18. Lev. xxv. 8-13.)

V. 2. These continually reiterated calls to joy and gladness, in serving God, should not pass unnoticed; for they shew, that exalted piety is the most abundant source of true rejoicing; and that sorrow and dejection do not spring from piety, even in religious persons; but arise from the want of more religion, and from occasional circumstances. (Marg. Ref. Notes, xxxiii. 1. Rom. xiv. 13-18. Gal. v. 22-26. Phil. iv. 4. 1 Pet. i. 8, 9.)

V. 3. Some versions render this verse as follows: "Acknowledge that JEHOVAH is God: it is he, (and not we ourselves,) that made us his people, and the sheep of his pasture;" and this is indeed the more literal translation.—'We are'; and by his power and goodness, not our own, we are become so great and mighty a nation; whom of his own good will alone he hath made his peculiar people, of whom he takes a tender care.' (Notes, Deut. vii. 6-8. 1 Sam.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The service of God would be the delight of all rational creatures, did they all know and love his glorious excellences, and were they sensible of their obligations to him. As far as we on earth take pleasure in worshipping him, and can serve him with gladness of heart, and songs of fervent praise; we emulate the employment, and anticipate the joys, of heaven. Let us then study to know the glorious and eternal JEHOVAH, as our Creator, and the God in whom we live, and move, and are; by whose arm we are upheld, and on whose bounty we are fed; and then we shall understand how reasonable it is, that we should be thankful and obedient to him. But if we can also say,

'And when like wandering sheep we strayed,

'He brought us to his fold again;'

We shall have abundant cause "to enter into his courts with praise, to be thankful to him, and to bless his name." His goodness to us hath been great beyond expression: the effects of his mercy will be everlasting to our souls, and his faithfulness is the perpetual security for the performance of his largest promises. And, as JEHOVAH's truth and mercy endure for ever; sinners of every land should be invited to come and rejoice in his salvation.—In the fulness of time the Gentiles were admitted into the Christian church, in performance of old-testament prophecies, but contrary to the narrow expectations of the Jews: and assuredly the inhabitants of all lands will ere long come, and "make a joyful noise before God our Saviour." So that this song of praise should be considered as a prophecy, and even used as a prayer, for the coming of that time, when all people shall know that the LORD he is God, and shall become his worshippers and "the sheep of his pasture."

NOTES.

PSALM CI. Title. 'The title tells us who made this psalm: and the matter of it is so plain, that any body may see, that it is a pious resolution of David, to govern first himself, and then his court, and then his kingdom, with so much care, that the good might expect all favour from him; but no wicked man of any sort, have the least countenance.' (Bp. Patrick.) Notes, lxxxv. 2-4. Gen. xviii. 17-19.)

V. 1. The mercy of God, shewn towards him, and his righteous judgments upon his persecutors, were not only the subjects of David's grateful praise, but the pattern which he proposed to imitate in his administration. (Notes, lxxxix. 1-4. cxxxvi. 10-22. Rom. xi. 22-24.) 'David considereth what manner of king he would be, when God should place him on the throne, promising openly that he would be merciful and just.' (Note, 2 Sam. xxiii. 3, 4. Marg. Ref.)

V. 2. 'Though as yet thou deferrest to place me in the kingly dignity; yet I will give myself to wisdom and uprightness, being a private man.' Some, however, think that the psalm was composed while David ruled over Judah, but not over Israel.—David purposed to unite wisdom and piety, with justice and mercy, in his behaviour before his family and court, as well as in his public administration. He meant to walk uprightly in the ordinances and commandments of God, as an example to his people. (Notes, Title, Deut. vi. 6-9. Josh. xxiv. 15. 2 Sam. vi. 20. 1 Tim. iii. 4, 5.) But knowing that his ability to perform his vow would depend upon the Lord's presence with him; he prayed with earnest desires, and as impatient of delay, that the Lord would speedily come and dwell with him, and bless him. (Marg. Ref. Notes, Ez. iii. 12. Matt. xxviii. 19, 20. Phil. iv. 10-13.)

V. 3. 'I will not propose to myself, or think of carrying into execution, any iniquitous scheme of politics, however advantageous or tempting it may appear. ... I will... reject it at once. "I hate the work of those who turn aside," 'who deviate from the divine law to serve their own interest.' (Notes, xxxvi. 1-4. cxxxv. 4, 5.)—'No such corrupt principle shall adhere to my soul, or find a place in my affections. How noble a resolution for a king to make! but how difficult an one for a king to keep! (Bp. Horne.)—'He sheweth that magistrates do not their duty except they be enemies to all vice.' (Marg. Ref.)

V. 4. 'I will turn him instantly out of my service, who shall dare to suggest to me any crooked counsels. I will have no familiarity with him, much less make him my favourite, who makes no conscience how he compasses his ends.' (Bp. Patrick.) (Marg. Ref. Notes, 2 Sam. xiii. 3, 4. xvi. 20-23. xvii. 1-4. 1 Kings xxi. 4-7. Prov. xxix. 12.)

V. 5. 'In promising to punish these vices, which are most pernicious in them that are about kings, he declareth that he will punish all.' (Marg. Ref. Notes, 1. 16.—21. lii. 3, 4. 2 Sam. xvi. 1-4. xix. 24-30. Prov. vi. 12-19. xxv. 23.)

V. 6. One great improvement of power, or authority, as a talent, either in church or state, consists in carefully and wisely selecting fit persons for all the different services required, in order to the prosperity and good order of both: though, alas! this is very rarely indeed attended to, and men with David's spirit are every where exceedingly wanted. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 7. (Notes, 2 Sam. iv. 9-12. 2 Kings v. 20-27. Prov. xx. 8. xxix. 12. Acts v. 1-11.)

V. 8. Early, Or, "in the mornings," that is, every morning. (Note, Jer. xxi. 11, 12.) Promptitude, activity, and perseverance are alike necessary to suppress vice in the state; and to keep the visible church, and even its most sacred offices, pure from the pollution of ambitious and covetous hypocrites. The latter is called "the city of the Lord;" but it has too often been made a city of merchandise, and even "a den of thieves." (Notes, Matt. xxi. 12, 13. John ii. 14-17. Marg. Ref.) In all this, David was an evident type of Christ, our righteous King, who alone fully accomplishes these most excellent purposes, (Note, xlv. 6, 7.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

When we celebrate the praises of the Divine perfections, we should, in many cases, consider them as patterns for our imitation; but we never can so clearly understand in what respect this example is imitable by us, as when we view it exhibited in the person of the incarnate Son of God. (Notes, John i. 12-17. Eph. v. 1, 2. Phil. ii. 5-8. 1 Pet. ii. 18-25.) His compassionate and condescending love to sinners harmonizes with the most perfect abhorrence of sin; and his conduct, as our exalted King, is conformable to his holy life on earth. He does not connive at any wickedness, or bear it in his presence; he abhors the works of those who turn aside from his righteous ways; and can no more allow his disciples to cleave to sin, than he can cleave to it himself. They who continue of a perverse disposition must depart from him; and at the day of judgment he will reject all the workers of iniquity, as those whom he "never knew." He will as certainly punish the subtle undermining slanderer, as the murderer: pride and covetousness will no more escape, than adultery or drunkenness: and hypocrites, and liars of every kind, will be doomed to the lake which burneth with fire and brimstone. (Notes, Rev. xxi. 5-8. xxii. 14, 15.) In short, he will destroy all impenitent sinners; and those with peculiar detestation, who form a part of his visible church, and are a scandal to it. Such are often removed from the earth, to prevent further mischief; but at length a final and eternal separation shall be made, and no wicked person shall ever enter the city of the Lord in the world to come. (Note, Rev. xxi. 22-27.) But he will search out the faithful, who repent and renounce their sins, trusting in his mercy; watching over them, and shewing them all favour: and they by his grace learn to walk before him in truth and righteousness; these are his servants on earth, and they shall dwell with him for ever in heaven. This is his determination, and invariable conduct; nor will he treat any as his people, who are not "redeemed from all iniquity, and" progressively "purified unto him, a peculiar people, zealous of good works."—This example should be copied by

PSALM CII.

The psalmist pours out doleful complaints, 1-11. He takes comfort from the eternity of God, 12. He predicts the triumph of the church, though then desolated, according to the promises of God, at the appointed time, and in answer to the prayers of his people, 13-17. He records the mercies of the Lord for the benefit of posterity, 18-22. Conscious of his own weakness, he rests his hope on the unchangeableness of God our saviour, 23-28.

A prayer *of the afflicted, when he is *overwhelmed, and *poureth out his complaint before the LORD.

HEAR my prayer, O LORD, and *let my cry come unto thee.

2 *Hide not thy face from me in the day when I am in trouble; *incline thine ear unto me: *in the day when I call, answer me speedily.

3 For *my days are consumed *like smoke, and *my bones are burned as an hearth.

4 *My heart is smitten, and *withered like grass; *so that I forget to eat my bread.

5 By reason of *the voice of my groaning, my bones cleave to *my skin.

6 I am *like *a pelican of the wilderness: I am like an owl of the desert.

7 I *watch, and am as a sparrow *alone upon the house-top.

8 *Mine enemies reproach me all the day; and they that are *mad against me, are *sworn against me.

9 For *I have eaten ashes like bread, and *mingled my drink with weeping.

10 *Because of thine indignation and thy wrath; for *thou hast lifted me up, and cast me down.

rulers and magistrates especially: justice, truth, goodness, and piety should be visible in their whole conduct: and then their patronage and influence should unite with the impartial and vigorous exercise of their authority, in discountenancing all vice and impiety, in protecting the righteous, and in promoting the cause of God. By a resolute and steady adherence to such a plan, wicked doers might be reclaimed or restrained; and we might appear like a part of the city of God, by the prevalence of equity and piety. Ministers, heads of families, and all others in the superior relations or stations of life, have also an important duty in this matter. Their example and influence, and the exercise of their authority; their refusal to be acquainted with notorious sinners, or to shew favour to them, or even to employ them; their decided disapprobation of slanderers, flatterers, and all dissemblers; and the encouragement of the faithful, humble, and upright, would have an extensive good effect; if they would adopt David's resolution, or rather imitate Christ's example. It is true, this would require much wisdom and courage; and of ourselves we are not sufficient for such services: but the Lord would come to us, and even abide with us, if we earnestly and cordially intreated him; and then his grace would be sufficient for us, his favour would render any station comfortable, and his blessings would crown our endeavours with success. But let us recollect, that if we refuse to obey his command and copy his example, whilst we call him our Lord and Master, he will treat us as hypocrites and liars, exclude us from his family, and drive us with indignation from his presence, as workers of iniquity, whom he never acknowledged or approved. (Notes, Matt. vii. 21-27.)

NOTES.

PSALM CII. Title. "A prayer for the afflicted: for he will be overwhelmed, and will pour out his meditation before the face of JEHOVAH."—This psalm seems to have been written towards the conclusion of the Babylonish captivity: (or, as some think, just after the return of the remnant under Zerubbabel:) for the use of the pious Jews who were overwhelmed with affliction, on account of the desolations of their holy city and temple: yet they poured out their complaint with hopes of redress, as God had promised to restore them again to their own land. (Notes, exxxvii. Ezra iii. 8-13. ix. 5-15. Neh. i. 4-11. ix. 5-38. Jer. xxix. 11. 14. Dan. ix.)—The termination of the reign of anti-christ, and the glorious consequences of that event, seem also to be predicted. (Notes, Is. lxiii. 15-19. lxiv.)

V. 1, 2. "Albeit we be in ever so great misery, yet there is ever room left for prayer." (Marg. Ref. Notes, i. 7-15. xci. 4-16. Phil. iv. 6, 7.)

V. 3-11. "These excessive kinds of speech shew how much the affliction of the church ought to wound the hearts of the godly."—Perhaps the psalmist was grievously afflicted in his own person, as well as on account of the public calamities: but he seems to personate Jerusalem and the church, during the desolations of the captivity. He complains that his health vanished like the smoke, which is scattered by the wind; his strength decayed as wood is consumed by the fire; and his spirits dried up as the grass is withered by the scorching sun. He had lost his appetite, was reduced to a skeleton, courted solitude as the pelican, or bittern, and owl, was deprived of sleep, and spent his time in mourning and complaints. The unjust reproaches and formidable combinations, of his enraged enemies, united with the just indignation of God, to fill him with deep distress. It seemed as if the Lord had only raised him to prosperity, in order to cast him down; and he was constrained to feed upon sorrow, as his bread, and, as it were, mingle his drink with tears. In short, he was like a man about to expire of some wasting sickness. (Notes, vi. 1-7. xxxii. 3-5. xxxviii. 1-10. xlii. 1-3. lv. 4-8. lxix. 1-4. 16-20. lxxx. 5. lxxxviii. 3-9. Job vi. 1-4. vii. 1-6. xix. 5-22. xxx. 15-24. Is. xxxviii. 9-15.)—All this well applies to the state of the church, during the Babylonish captivity; and corresponds to the language of Jeremiah in the book of Lamentations. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 12. It is very beautiful and instructive to view the psalmist consoling himself under all his afflictions, and the prospect of a speedy dissolution, while his people and the church were in deep distress, by the thoughts that God would still be glorious, would still favour the church, and restore her from her desolations. (Notes, 13-28.) His sufferings and death, therefore, might be regarded as comparatively of little consequence.—"Thy remembrance" may mean either the church's remembrance of JEHOVAH's wonderful works for Israel, and engagements to her; or rather his remembrance of his holy covenant, and of her desolate and afflicted state, from which he had promised to deliver her. (exxxv. 13. Note, Ex. iii. 15.)

V. 13-22. God had, by his prophet Jeremiah, fixed a time for liberating the captive Jews, and for rebuilding the city and the temple: that time was come; and this excited the prayers of believers, who favoured the very dust and stones of Zion, for the sake of the temple which had stood upon it. (Notes, exxxvii. 1-6. 2 Chr. xxxvi. 21. Jer. xxv. 9-12. xxvii. 4-9. xxxix. 10-14. Dan. ix. 2, 3.) In their destitute and forlorn condition, they not only "groaned, being burdened" with the oppression and persecution of those who detained them prisoners; but they were instant in prayers, which doubtless they accompanied with humiliation for their sins. These prayers the Lord would not despise; but in answer to them, as one who "looked down from his holy heaven," he would surely appear for their release; and when he had conducted them to Jerusalem, they would there declare his name and his praise. Under his protection, and by his assistance, the temple would be rebuilt upon mount Zion: when he would appear so glorious in his power, truth, and love, that the heathen would fear his wrath, and all kings around him would stand in awe of his glory; many people would gather together out of the adjacent kingdoms to serve the Lord; and these events would be recorded for the edification of future ages, and of other nations, which should at length be brought into the church by the new-creating power of God. (Marg. Ref. Notes, xxii. 30, 31. Is. liii. 9, 10. 1 Pet. ii. 9, 10.)—But this prophecy will have a more full accomplishment, when the Jews shall be converted to Christianity, and gathered from their dispersions; when the tedious captivity of the church, under the new-testament Babylon, shall finally be terminated; and when the fulness of the Gentiles, with all their kings and kingdoms, shall be brought into the church. (Notes, Rev. xviii. xix.)—The old version of the fifteenth and two following verses, is quite literal, and very expressive. "Then the heathen shall fear the Lord,

24 <sup>1</sup>I said, O my God, take me not away in the midst of my days: <sup>2</sup>thy years are throughout all generations.

25 <sup>1</sup>Of old hast thou laid the foundation of the earth; and the heavens are the work of thy hands.

David earnestly praises God for his plentiful mercy and goodness to him, and to Israel, 1—10; his fatherly compassion to the frailty of those who fear and obey him; and his constant regard to their posterity, 11—18. He calls on men, and angels, and all creatures, to join him in blessing the Lord, the universal sovereign, 19—22.

and all the kings of the earth thy glory: when the LORD shall build up Zion, and shall appear in his glory; and shall turn unto the prayer of the desolate, and not despise their prayer.—“Shall praise the LORD, (18.) JAH-Jehallelu-JAH. (Note, lxxiii. 4.)

V. 23, 24. Perhaps the psalmist, personally, from his time of life and state of health, had expected to see the re-establishment of Jerusalem, the prosperity of his people, and multitudes thronging to the temple to sacrifice, and to worship God. But he was unexpectedly seized with a debilitating disease, and concluded that he was about to be taken away in the midst of his days; as Job, Hezekiah, and others had done: and he prayed, as Moses also did, that he might live to witness the prosperity of his people, which he by faith clearly foresaw.—Some, however, apply this to the church of Israel. She was, as it were, on her way to meet her expected King; but at the captivity her strength was weakened, and her days seemed to be shortened: but she prayed to be spared, that she might receive the promised blessing.—Midst of my days. (24.) (Note, lv. 23.)

V. 25—28. The eternity and immutability of God, the creator of the world, and the saviour of the church, encouraged the pious Jews under their distresses. The visible creation indeed waxes old, and is wearing out, and will at length be changed as an old garment for a new one. (Notes, Is. li. 4—6. Matt. xxiv. 35. 2 Pet. iii. 10—13.) But the Creator is “the same, yesterday, and for ever.” (Note, Heb. xiii. 8.) And because he lives and reigns, his church must be preserved; a succession of believers, as the children of Abraham, shall serve him whilst the world endures; and all the redeemed shall live with him in heaven for ever. We cannot but know from the Scriptures above referred to, what views the inspired writers of the Old Testament had of the expected Messiah, whom they spake of as the eternal and unchangeable Creator, as well as the Redeemer and King of Israel. (Notes, John i. 1—3. Col. i. 15—20. Heb. i. 1—4. Marg. Ref.) The apostle, writing to the Hebrews, no doubt quoted this psalm in the sense in which it was generally understood. (Note, Heb. i. 10—12.) “It cannot be too hard for thee to raise Zion out of the ruins, who hast many ages ago created this goodly fabric by thy eternal Word.”—(Bp. Patrick.)—Thou art the same. (27.) “Thou art He.” (Notes, Ex. iii. 14. xli. 2—4. John viii. 54—59.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The more overwhelming our afflictions are, the greater cause have we to “pour out our complaint before God;” and he hath invited and commanded us to “call upon him in the time of trouble,” and hath assured us, that he will not hide his face from us, or “leave us comfortless.” In this world we must expect tribulation, and we know not how deep and durable our sorrows may be; but should they be so various and grievous, as to warrant the use of the strong language of this psalm, they would not be equal to our deservings; and it would still be “of the LORD’s mercies that we are not consumed;” still there would be hope for us to humble ourselves before him, and patiently to wait and pray for his forgiving love. (Notes, Lam. iii. 21—30. 39—41.) Then, should we even lose our relish for every earthly comfort, and be kept by pain and anguish from taking any rest; should we be treated with general contempt and hatred, and struggle with sore temptations and anguish of spirit, and have death continually before our eyes; we should still have inward supports, and hope would brighten our otherwise gloomy prospect. The believer, who has attained to a good measure of ripeness in judgment and experience, will feel himself deeply interested in the concerns of the church. Her desolations, divisions, and corruptions pain his heart, in his most prosperous days; and double the poignancy of his personal afflictions. The triumphs of infidels and profligates, and the sorrows of true believers, cause him to partake of the bread and water of affliction, and to humble himself before God in lamentations and prayers. On the other hand, he rejoices in the promises of God relating to the security and prosperity of his church: and the revival of the power and purity of religion revives his heart, even under grievous pains, and at the approach of death. This might afford us never-failing comfort, if we duly attended to the word of God. The success of the gospel has indeed hitherto been small, compared with the hundreds of millions of the human species. The low estate of vital godliness, within the visible church, hath often made her appear like one dying of a consumption: but “the LORD will” certainly “arise, and have mercy on Zion.” Though, like Jerusalem of old, the Christian church seem laid in ruins, by the assaults of open enemies, and the treachery of professed friends, and through the prevalence of idolatry, superstition, infidelity, and impiety; yet the servants of God “take pleasure” even in her ruins, and their prayers incessantly ascend to heaven in her behalf. They are indeed often poor and destitute in the world, and despised by proud ungodly men; and sometimes they are laid to groan in prisons, as men appointed to death: but the Lord regards, and will honour them; he will look down from heaven, to hear and deliver them; he will build up Zion, that his glory may appear; and indeed “the set time” to favour her is near at hand, and many revolutions, within the former kingdom of antichrist, seem evident presages of its approaching ruin. Shortly the Lord will deliver and purify his church, and Jews and Gentiles shall unite in worshipping God our Saviour, and in declaring his name and glory in Zion; and all the kingdoms of the earth shall become his worshippers and servants. Were not these things written for the use of the generations to come, that nations then unborn might praise the Lord, when they beheld the performance of these ancient prophecies? It is true the Christian church was so soon debilitated and corrupted, her days of prosperity were so shortened, and her enfeebled estate hath been so prolonged, that many despair of happier days. Yet such are most evidently predicted, and the predictions are multiplied, and varied, throughout the sacred volume; and He, who laid the foundation of the earth, is the unchangeable and eternal support of his church; and as he hath foretold the dissolution of the frame of nature, he hath also assured us that his cause shall triumph on earth before that grand consummation. Let us then rejoice in God our Saviour, and give ourselves unto prayer; assured that the children of his servants shall continue, and be multiplied exceedingly, to the end of time; and their seed shall be established for ever in heaven.

NOTES.

PSALM CIII. Title. David is supposed to have written this most beautiful psalm, when he was newly recovered from a dangerous sickness, to vigorous health. (Notes, xxx. 2—12. xxxviii. 1—10. xli. 1—8.)

V. 1. “He wakeneth his dulness to praise God, shewing that both understanding and affections, mind and heart, are too little to set forth his praise.” (Marg. Ref. Notes, lxxiii. 5, 6. Deut. vi. 5. Mark xii. 28—34.)

V. 2. David’s fear of losing the sense and remembrance of the benefits which God had bestowed on him, shews, both what the fallen nature of man is most prone to, and what divine grace most teaches the regenerate to watch and pray against; namely, ingratitude to God, and forgetfulness of his benefits. (Marg. Ref. Notes, cvii. 12—14. 2 Chr. xxxii. 25, 26. 31. Luke xvii. 11—19. P. O.)

V. 3, 4. The sickness, with which the psalmist had been visited, was the correction of his sin: but, having obtained forgiveness, the malady also was removed. (Notes, xxxii. 3—5. cvii. 17—22. Job xxxiii. 19—30. Is. xxxviii. 17—20. Matt. ix. 2—8. P. O. 1—8.) Crowneth, &c. (Marg. Ref.) Thus his life was redeemed from the grave, and his soul from “the pit of destruction;” and all his comforts were restored and increased. Sinful passions are the diseases of the soul: but if sin be pardoned, these also will be healed.

V. 5. Eagle’s. It is generally agreed, that the eagle is very long-lived, and seems at an advanced age to possess the vigour of youth. Perhaps the psalmist had nothing more in view than this. He had been reduced to great weakness, with loss of appetite, and other infirmities, which he supposed to indicate his approaching death, or the labour and sorrow of old age. But he unexpectedly recovered health, appetite, and strength; and seemed, like the eagle, to be restored to the vigour of youth at an advanced time of life.—Many traditions about the eagle seem not sufficiently proved; nor is it certain, that in moulting her feathers, she materially differs from other birds.—“I can never sufficiently praise thee, who dost restore my strength, and make my youth and freshness return like the eagle’s. Oh, that I may with fresh delight and joy be still praising thee, and be lifted up to heaven, (as they are when they have renewed their plumes,) in more vigorous love, and affectionate desires and endeavours, to employ all my renewed strength in thy faithful services.” (Bp. Patrick.) (Notes, Is. xl. 27—31. Ez. i. 5—14. Rev. iv. 6—8.)

V. 6—8. Lively gratitude for recent personal benefits led the psalmist to remember, with adoring praise, the glorious perfections of his gracious Benefactor, as manifested in his dealings with his creatures. The omnipotent Sovereign of the world uses his power in executing righteousness, relieving the oppressed, and crushing the oppressor. (Notes, xli. 5, 6. lxxii. 4—7. xcix. 4.

6 The LORD 'executeth righteousness and judgment for all that are oppressed.

7 He "made known his ways unto Moses, "his acts unto the children of Israel.

8 The LORD is 'merciful and gracious, 'slow to anger, and 'plenteous in mercy.

9 He will not always chide; 'neither will he keep his anger for ever.

10 He hath not 'dealt with us after our sins; nor rewarded us according to our iniquities.

11 'For 'as the heaven is high above the earth, so great is 'his mercy toward them that fear him.

12 As far 'as the east is from the west, 'so far hath he removed our transgressions from us.

13 Like 'as a father pitieth his children; so the LORD pitieth "them that fear him.

14 For 'he knoweth our frame; he remembereth that "we are dust.

(Marg. Ref.) This he especially did when he delivered Israel from Egyptian bondage; and by Moses made himself known to the people, and brought them acquainted with his works, his truth, and laws: and especially he shewed his glory to Moses, and proclaimed his name, as "merciful and gracious, slow to anger, and plenteous in mercy." (Note, Ex. xxxiv. 5-7. Marg. Ref.)

V. 9. 'He sheweth first his severe judgment; but so soon as the sinner is humbled, he receiveth him to mercy.—Such expressions must always be understood of true believers; or of those who by affliction are brought to repentance, and works meet for repentance: for God will keep his anger for ever, in the full meaning of the words, against all that continue to the end of life impenitent and unbelieving. (Notes, 11-13. xxx. 5. lxxvii. 5-12. xcii. 6, 7. Is. lvii. 15, 16. Jer. iii. 4, 5. Mic. vii. 18-20.)

V. 10. 'Blessed be his name, there is mercy even in our punishments: our sufferings are never so great as our sins.' (Bp. Patrick.) (Notes, Ezra ix. 13-15. Job xi. 3. 6. Lam. iii. 21-23. Hab. iii. 2.)

V. 11-13. The immeasurable height, of the arch of heaven, is an emblem continually before us, of the infinite mercy of God to his people. The space, betwixt the rising and setting sun, reminds us of the immense distance to which their guilt is removed from them; and the compassion of a tender Father feebly represents the kindness and tenderness of God to them. (Marg. Ref. Note, Is. lv. 8, 9.) A wise and good father will not be severe to mark every failure in his child; he will encourage his feeble attempts to obey him; he will feel every stroke which he inflicts, when chastising him for his good; and he will always gladly remove his sufferings when he is able. The character, to which these blessings exclusively belong, even those who fear God, should be carefully noted. (Notes, cxlvii. 10, 11. Gen. xxii. 10-12. Ec. xii. 11-14. Acts x. 1, 2. 34, 35.)

V. 14. The word rendered "our frame," generally means, the device or imagination which we frame in our hearts, (Notes, Gen. vi. 5. viii. 20-22. Heb.) and the clause seems to mean, that God knoweth our fallen nature, both in respect of its depravity, and frailty; and should he deal with us in strict justice, we must all be crushed and destroyed. He therefore exercises fatherly compassion to those who fear him, notwithstanding the evil which he witnesses in their hearts and lives; and he is long-suffering to the wicked, giving them space for repentance, and often warning them, before he inflicts deserved punishment. (Notes, Rom. ii. 4-6. 2 Pet. iii. 9. 14-16. Rev. ii. 20-23.)

Dust. (Note, Gen. xviii. 27, 28.) The sentence "Dust thou art, and to dust shalt thou return," was pronounced against man as fallen. (Note, Gen. iii. 17-19.) "By one man sin entered into the world, and death by sin; and so death passed upon all men, because all have sinned." (Note, Rom. v. 12-14.)

V. 15-18. (Notes, ch. 3-6. xl. 8. Jam. i. 9-11. 1 Pet. i. 23-25.) This affecting illustration of human frailty, and the transient nature of all earthly glory and prosperity, frequently occurs in Scripture: but it is here contrasted, most beautifully, with the everlasting mercy and truth of God. "Let not man presume, who withereth like the green herb: but then let not man despair, whose nature, with all its infirmities, the Son of God hath taken upon him...The flower which faded in Adam, blossoms anew in Christ, never to fade again." (Bp. Horne.) The language used by the psalmist is very emphatical: "The mercy of JEHOVAH, is from eternity, and to eternity." (Note, ch. 1, 2. Eph. i. 4-7. iii. 9-12. 2 Tim. i. 9.) And this mercy, which is from everlasting in its source, and to everlasting in its efficacy, is ensured to all them who fear God, in every generation; who must therefore be the same with true Christians. (Luke i. 50.) "And his righteousness to children's children." "His just and faithful keeping of his promise;" that is, the promise made to Abraham, and in him to all believers, of special benefits to their posterity. (Note, Gen. xvii. 7. 8. Jer. xxxii. 39-41. Acts ii. 37-40. Rom. iv. 9-12. Gal. iii. 9. 14. Heb. vi. 13. 18.) But then the persons spoken of, to prevent mistakes, are further characterized; "To such as keep his covenant, and to those that remember his commandments to do them." They come to him, according to the covenant of mercy ratified "with Abraham in Christ, which the law given four hundred and thirty years afterwards could not

PSALM CIV.

The psalmist celebrates the glory of the divine perfections, as displayed in creation and providence, 1-32. He determines perpetually to meditate with delight on God and his works, and predicts the destruction of the wicked, 33-35.

BLESS the LORD, O my soul: <sup>1</sup>O LORD my God, <sup>2</sup>thou art very great: <sup>3</sup>thou art clothed with honour and majesty.

our character, we need not yield to discouragement at the consideration of our most atrocious and multiplied transgressions; seeing the mercies of God are still larger than they all: and when we trust in those mercies, he will put away our sins far from us, and bury them in the depths of the sea. Indeed we are yet weak and frail; our days are few, our temporal comforts are withering as the grass, and we shall soon be gone, and "our place know us no more:" but our heavenly Father knoweth our frame, and "remembereth that we are dust;" and he pitieth us under all our sorrows and trials. He will indeed thwart our wayward inclinations, and will not indulge us to our hurt; but he will support and comfort us under every cross, and he cannot want power to relieve his afflicted children. His mercy is from everlasting in its origin, and to everlasting in its blessed effects, and should be contrasted with all the fading glories of this world: and they, who belong to the Lord, have the fairest prospect of felicity for their children; and may entertain a cheerful hope, that he will make known his righteousness and salvation even to their remote posterity. But they are distinguished by their characters, as well as by their privileges: for they "join themselves to the Lord" according to his gracious covenant, and, whilst they trust in his mercy, they "remember his commandments to do them." (Notes, Is. iv. 1-3. lvi. 3-7.) Our glorious God and King hath prepared a mercy-seat for his throne in heaven, on which he ruleth over all. Let us then rejoice, that innumerable hosts of angels, who "excel in strength," are continually celebrating his praises. Their employment and happiness consist in doing his commandments, in hearkening to the voice of his word, in being his servants, and doing his pleasure. Such would have been our constant delight, if we had not been fallen creatures: such it is in a measure become, if we are "born of God;" and such it will be for ever in heaven to all who arrive there; nor can we be perfectly happy, till we can take unwearied pleasure in perfect obedience to the will of our God. Let us then copy the examples of these bright spirits; and cordially join our feeble hallelujahs to their exalted praises of God our Saviour: let us glorify him, with "all his works in all places of his dominion;" and rejoice in hope, that the earth, as well as the heavens, will at length be filled with those, who praise the Lord, and "do his commandments, hearkening unto the voice of his word."

NOTES.

PSALM CIV. V. 1. The Septuagint ascribes this psalm to David: and as it opens with the same words, which both begin and close the preceding psalm, some expositors conjecture that it was written at the same time. (Notes, ciii. 1. 20-22.) The psalmist celebrates the mighty power and goodness of God, in the fabric of the world; as the hundred and third doth his benefits to himself, and the children of men. (Bp. Patrick.) The prophet sheweth that we need not to enter into the heavens to seek God; for all the order of nature, with the propriety and placing of the elements, are most lively mirrors to see his majesty in. He manifests himself in each of his works; and though he himself is invisible; yet his garments of glory and beauty are every where most clearly seen. (Notes, 2. xciii. 1. xcvi. 6. Is. lix. 16-19. Dan. vii. 9-12.)

V. 2. The formation of light was the beginning of the work of this visible creation, by which God discovered his glory in the beauty and excellency of his other works. (Notes, Gen. i. 3-5. 14-19. Job xxxviii. 19-21. Is. xlv. 7. 2 Cor. iv. 5, 6.) Knowledge, wisdom, purity, and felicity are denoted by the emblem of light; and with these the Lord is most gloriously adored. (Notes, xcvi. 11. Col. i. 9-14. 1 John i. 5-7.) 'Thou art kept from all mortal eyes by that inaccessible light, wherein thou dwellest above.' (Note, 1 Tim. vi. 14-16.) The writers of the New Testament expressly ascribe the work of creation to the Divine Saviour: and when, at his transfiguration, "his face did shine as the sun, and his raiment was white as the light;" he gave his disciples a glimpse of "that glory which he had with the Father before the world was." (Notes, Matt. xvii. 1-13. P. O. 1-13. John i. 5. Rev. i. 12-19.) 'The spacious heavens are the royal pavilion, which thy sovereign power has extended, like a canopy, for thy majesty in this great palace of the world.' (Bp. Patrick.) (Notes, cii. 25-28. Is. xl. 21-24. xcv. 12, 13.)

V. 3. JEHOVAH is here represented, as building the upper stories of his magnificent palace, in those waters above the firmament, whence the clouds are formed; upon which he comes riding as in a chariot, when by his thunder and lightning he appals or destroys the inhabitants of the earth: and he "walketh upon the wings of the wind," when storms and tempest execute his commands. (Notes, 2 Sam. xxii. 7-16. Is. xix. 1. Am. ix. 5, 6. Nah. i. 2-6. Matt. xxvi. 63-68. Rev. i. 7.)

V. 4. The old translation of this verse is strictly literal Which maketh the spirits his messengers, and a flaming fire his ministers." The word rendered "spirits" may, however, be translated winds.—As the prophet here sheweth, that all visible powers are ready to serve God; so the apostle beholds in this glass, how the very angels also are obedient to his commandments.—'He sends his angels, (and what king is there that hath such noble ministers?) sometimes in vehement winds, and sometimes in lightning and thunder, whereby they execute his royal pleasure.' (Bp. Patrick.) 'Who maketh those glorious spirits of heaven his messengers; and causeth them to appear in the forms of fire; and maketh both the winds and the fire to execute those offices of revenge, or preservation, which he committeth to him.' (Bp. Hall.) The apostle's infallible exposition, however, seems to include the whole ministration of angels, and to confine the verse to that subject; whence we learn that the holy angels are swift as the wind in obeying the commands of the Lord; and as a flame of fire with love and zeal. (Note, Heb. i. 5-7.)

V. 5. The great Creator so formed the earth, and ordered every thing respecting it; as to provide effectually, that should preserve its relative situation in the universe, and its regular course, without deviation, perpetually, until the appointed time for its final dissolution. (Notes, xxiv. 1, 2. xciii. 1. xcvi. 10. Job xxxviii. 4-7. Rev. xx. 11-15.)

V. 6-9. In the beginning, the waters covered the whole chaotic mass; so that no mountains appeared above them: but, at the voice of the Creator, which was as thunder, they hasted away. "And the mountains ascend, and the valleys descend, to the place which thou hast established for them.... Thou hast set them," (the waters,) "a bound which they shall not pass; they shall not return to cover the earth." (8, 9.) This is the old version: it accords with the Septuagint, and is more clear than the present translation. 'Immediately the dry land was seen, part of which, by thy wonderful contrivance, O Lord, rose up in lofty hills; the rest sunk down in lowly valleys; where thou hast cut channels for the waters to run into the main ocean, the place thou hadst appointed for them: and there, though they restlessly toss and swell, yet they cannot get over the shores, wherein thou hast inclosed them, nor shall they ever recover their former liberty, or overflow the earth again.' (Bp. Patrick.)—Upon thy command the waters sunk down into one place, so as the hills, (thereupon appearing,) seemed to ascend, and the valleys to go down into their settled hollowness; thither, by thy divine appointment, did the waters gather themselves, and there abide.' (Bp. Hall.) (Notes, Gen. i. 2. 9, 10. Job xxxviii. 8-11. Prov. viii. 26-30. Jer. v. 20-25.)—Some suppose that the retreating of the waters after the deluge was meant; and the clauses, "the waters stood above the mountains," and "that they turn not again to cover the earth," favour the interpretation. Yet, the psalmist is speaking of creation; (and a single exception, the miracle of the deluge, if alluded to,) does not abrogate the general rule which is often spoken of. (Notes, Gen. vii. 11-23. viii. 1-3. 20-22. ix. 9-17. Is. liv. 6-10. Am. ix. 5, 6. Matt. viii. 23-27. 2 Pet. iii. 5-7.)

V. 10, 11. 'The waters of the sea are not only prevented from destroying the earth, but, by a wonderful machinery, are rendered the means of preserving every living thing which moveth thereon. Partly ascending from the great deep, through strata of the earth, partly exhaled in vapour from the surface of the ocean into the air, and from thence falling in rain, especially on the tops, and by the sides of mountains, they break forth in fresh springs, having left their salts behind them; they trickle through the valleys between the hills, receiving fresh supplies as they go; and, after watering by their innumerable windings immense tracts of country, they return to the place from whence they came. Thus every animal hath an opportunity of quenching that thirst, which must otherwise put a period to its existence. "The wild asses," are especially mentioned, because they live in remote and sandy deserts: yet, they are, by the God of nature, taught the way to the waters; inasmuch that the parched traveller findeth them to be the best guides in the world; and needeth only to follow the herds of them descending to the streams.' (Bp. Horne.) (Notes, 27-30. Gen. i. 9. Job xxxix. 5-8. Is. xli. 17-20. xliii. 14-21.)

V. 12. By the springs of waters, in the valleys, the birds delight to build their nests; and, concealed in the branches of the trees, to pour out their cheerful notes.—The music of birds was the first song of thanksgiving which was offered from the earth, before man was formed. All their sounds are different, but all harmonious; and, altogether, compose a choir which we cannot imitate. (Wesley.) (Marg. Ref.)

V. 13. 'As for the hills, which constantly enrich the lower grounds; he waters them from the regions above; whence dews distil, and showers of rain

come pouring down.' (Bp. Patrick.) (Notes, 3. Am. ix. 5, 6.) Thus the whole earth is satisfied and enriched, by "the fruit" or effects of the Lord's most wonderful contrivance. (Note, lxx. 8-13.)

V. 14, 15. 'He describeth God's provident care over man, who doth not only provide necessary things for him, as herbs and other meat; but also things to rejoice and comfort him, as wine, and oil, or ointments.'—Under the word herb, all kinds of corn, pulse, and vegetable food are comprised; and likewise the produce of the vineyards and olive-yards. (Notes, Gen. i. 11, 12. Judg. ix. 8-15. Matt. xxvi. 29. Marg. Ref.) Bread and wine, and oil, and every thing necessary to man and beast, are produced from the soil, according to the purpose and power of God. He could have sent all down from the clouds, as he did the manna, had he seen good.

V. 16. The largest trees, and most flourishing, as the cedars of Lebanon, grow without man's care. They are, both on this account, and also by reason of their vast size, "the trees of the LORD," which "he hath planted;" yet by no means comparable to "the trees of righteousness, the planting of the LORD, that he might be glorified." (Notes, xci. 12-15. Is. lxi. 1-3.)

V. 17, 18. (Note, 12.) The kind and condescending attention of the omnipotent Creator, to the meanest of his creatures, as thus introduced along with his special regard to man, is very beautiful and affecting to a serious mind. (Marg. Ref. Note, Prov. xxx. 24-28.)

V. 19. The psalmist next celebrates the wisdom of God, in the motions and revolutions of the heavenly bodies. The moon divides time by months, and its changes divide the months also: the seasons of the year were anciently computed by moons, and the Jewish festivals were fixed in the same manner.—"The sun, or solar light, seemeth to know the exact time of its coming on, and going off, and filleth the course prescribed to it without the least deviation." (Bp. Horne.) (Notes, Gen. i. 14-19. Lev. xxiii. 4. Num. xxv. 11-15. Deut. iv. 19. Job xxviii. 12. Jer. xxxi. 35-37.)

V. 20-23. The bountiful and wise Creator hath so ordered it, that the beasts of prey naturally shun the light, and seldom leave their dens, till it is dark, and man is retired to his rest: so that there is no great danger from them, even in the regions where they most abound, except in the night-time. Then they range abroad, and, in their way, "seek their meat from God;" till the sun ariseth, and man returns to his work, and then they retire to their dens. (Notes, lxxvi. 13-17. Gen. i. 3-5. Is. xlv. 7. Marg. Ref.) Wicked men, who choose darkness, as best suited to the commission of their crimes, with secrecy and impunity, and who "hate the light," of God's word, "because their deeds are evil," resemble the savage beasts, in this and many other respects. (Notes, Job xxiv. 13-17. John iii. 19-21. Rom. xiii. 11-14. Eph. v. 8-14. 1 Thes. v. 1-3.) As do they also, who spend the night in revels and dissipation, and retire to rest when they ought to set about some useful employment: for thus they seem to renounce their kindred to the human species, and to be ambitious of a relation to the wild beasts of the forest. In nations, who sit in darkness for want of revelation, Satan seems to have permission to range and devour at pleasure, (Note, Ex. xxii. 18;) but when "the Sun of righteousness" ariseth, this roaring lion has his power diminished, and men are stirred up to "labour for the meat which endureth unto everlasting life."

V. 24. 'Transported with the survey, the psalmist breaks forth into an exclamation, (and what heart has not already anticipated him?) on the variety and magnificence, the harmony and proportion, of the works of God, in this visible, perishable world. What then are the miracles of grace and glory! What are those invisible and eternal things, "which God hath prepared for

V. 25, 26. The word rendered "wide," signifies literally spacious of both hands, being dual. 'This great and spacious sea, also, which seems to embrace the earth in its arms, is no less full of thy wonderful works.' (Bp. Patrick.) —'There is not in all nature a more august and striking object than the ocean. Its inhabitants are as numerous as those upon the land; nor is the wisdom and power of the Creator less displayed, perhaps, in their formation and preservation, from the smallest fish that swims, to the enormous tyrant of the deep, the leviathan himself. By means of navigation, Providence has opened a communication between the most distant parts of the globe; the largest solid bodies are wafted with incredible swiftness, upon one fluid, by the impulse of another, and seas join the countries which they appear to divide.' (Bp. Horne.) (Note, Gen. i. 9.)—'There the ships sail as swiftly as the fishes swim; fetching us the riches both of sea and land; and there that great leviathan finds room enough to tumble up and down, and sport himself, in his absolute dominion over all that the sea contains.' (Bp. Patrick.)—Many authors, and among the rest Bishop Patrick, in commenting on Job, suppose the leviathan to mean the crocodile; but the text before us, so fully decides the leviathan to be an inhabitant of the sea, that this respectable author paraphrases it, in direct opposition to his exposition of the Scripture before referred to! (Notes, lxxv. 13-17. Job xli. Is. xxvii. 1.) The word rendered "things creeping," is used concerning the fishes, in the history of the creation; and, as none of them, properly speaking, have legs and feet, and many of them, in great measure, lie and crawl at the bottom of the water; there is a propriety in considering them as a peculiar species of reptiles. (Gen. i. 20. Marg.)—Beasts. (25.) Or, "living creatures." (Rev. iv. 6-8.)

V. 27-30. The vast creation, forming one great family, maintained upon the riches and bounty of JEHOVAH, as the great householder, is a very striking idea; whilst, at his will, one generation of creatures perish, a new generation succeeds; and successive crops of vegetable productions renew, and cover the face of the earth. (Marg. Ref. Notes, Matt. vi. 25-32.)—The twenty-eighth verse may be literally rendered, "Thou wilt give them; they will gather: thou wilt open thine hand; they shall be satisfied with good." Indeed, the whole passage may be read in the future.—The Holy Spirit seems to be spoken of in Scripture, as the immediate agent in giving and preserving life, both natural, spiritual, and eternal. (Notes, xxxiii. 6. Gen. i. 2. Job xxxiii. 1-4.)

V. 31. The old version here is, "Glory be to the LORD for ever; let the LORD rejoice in his works." Our present translation is more literal: but the variation shews, that no certain rule has been adopted in rendering such passages; some being rendered in the future, as predictions, others as prayers, in the imperative, and that the context in general must determine in which sense we should understand them. (Notes, Gen. i. 31. Is. lxii. 1-5. Jer. xxxii. 39-41. Zeph. iii. 14-17. Luke xv. 3-7. 22-32. 2 Thes. i. 5-10. Marg. Ref.)

V. 32. 'At his presence the earth trembleth, and the mountains (as our fathers saw at mount Sinai,) are full of fire and smoke.' (Bp. Patrick.) It is probable, however, that earthquakes and volcanos, as terrific displays of the Creator's power, (in whatever way men account for them,) were also intended: and perhaps the last general conflagration. (Notes, 2, 3. Ex. xix. 16-20. Hab. iii. 3-5. Heb. xii. 18-21. 2 Pet. iii. 10-13. Marg. Ref.)

V. 33. While I have my being, or "Till I be no more," that is, on earth, or rather, "while I am yet;" so long as I exist. (Notes, cxlv. 1, 2. cxlvi. 2.)

V. 34. (Notes, i. 1-3. lxiii. 1-6. cxxxix. 17, 18. Phil. iv. 4.)

PSALM CV.

An exhortation to praise God, to make known his works, to glory in him, and to seek his favour, 1-7. A brief history of God's goodness to his people, from the call of Abraham to the settlement of Israel in Canaan, 8-45.

O *GIVE thanks unto the LORD; *call upon his name: *make known his deeds among the people.
2 *Sing unto him, sing psalms unto him: *talk ye of all his wondrous works.

3 *Glory ye in his holy name: *let the heart of them rejoice that seek the LORD.

4 *Seek the LORD and his strength: *seek his face evermore.

5 *Remember his marvellous works that he hath done: his wonders, and "the judgments of his mouth;

6 O *ye seed of Abraham his servant, ye children of Jacob *his chosen.

7 He is *the LORD our God: *his judgments are in all the earth.

8 *He hath remembered his covenant for ever, the word which he commanded to *a thousand generations.

The psalmist concludes as he began, "Bless thou the LORD, O my soul;" only calling on all that read and sing the psalm, and on all creatures, to join with him in praising the eternal and glorious God of heaven and earth. Hallelujah. (Notes, lxxviii. 4. ciii. 1, 2, 20-22.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Every object, which we behold or reflect on, may remind us to bless and praise the Lord, who is very great, and arrayed with majesty, glory, and excellency, infinitely surpassing our comprehension. "His eternal power and Godhead" are clearly seen, by the things which he hath made: his glory, like the sun, becomes visible by its own splendour; and they are without excuse, who do not love, and thank, and worship him. (Note, Rom. i. 18-22.) The heavens stretched forth as his curtain; the light as his magnificent garment; the clouds as his chambers, or his chariots; the winds and flames as his servants and messengers; and the holy angels, executing his commands with inconceivable zeal, alacrity, and promptitude, are so many demonstrations of his power and authority; and shew that all his creatures serve him, apostate spirits, and apostate man, alone excepted. The less we can comprehend of the manner, in which the Creator retains the earth in its course, and the seasons in their order; the more we should admire and adore his power, wisdom, and goodness: and whilst we consider the numerous and invaluable advantages, which we derive from the ocean, and from the wonderful process, by which the earth is watered from that great reservoir; we should remember to bless the Lord for his faithfulness to Noah and his posterity. We may likewise observe the wisdom, love, and power of God in the instinctive propensities of all animals: by which they are not only led to the means of their own preservation, and the continuance of each species, but are rendered subservient to our comfort and benefit. When we reflect on the provision which the bounteous Creator hath made for the wants of all his creatures, we should also notice the natural worship, so to speak, which they render unto him; whilst the feathered songsters warble his praise, and even the lions, roaring in the woods, "seek their meat from God." Yet man, forgetful and ungrateful man, is favoured with the largest measure of his kindness: to him he giveth all things richly to enjoy; not only bringing food out of the earth, but wine and oil for his exhilaration and pleasure. He hath put the animal tribes under his dominion; and those which render him no service, stand in awe of him, and are taught to retire to their dens, when the rising sun calls him to his work; and in general they only venture forth, when night hath drawn her sable curtain to favour his repose. Well then may we break forth in admiration, and say, "O LORD, how manifold are thy works! in wisdom hast thou made them all: the earth is full of thy riches!" For the seas and the dry land, the air, and even the bowels of the earth, are abundantly replenished with useful treasures for the service of man. Yet let us remember that we are pensioners, and, in some sense, fellow-commoners, with the inferior creatures; which "all wait upon the LORD," who "giveth them their meat in due season;" which gather what he giveth, and are examples to us of contentment and moderation. Let us also recollect, that death, which sweeps away the innumerable multitudes of living creatures that people the earth, and makes room for successive generations, first entered by man's sin; and likewise that we are not sent into the world, as Leviathan into the great deep, "to play therein; either by living merely for amusement, or by preying upon our inferiors." We have much to do; we are sentenced to eat our bread in the sweat of our brow; and he who does nothing useful to society, lives upon the labour of others. We ought, therefore, to "work out our own salvation," to improve our talents, and to serve our generation, from the morning to the evening of our lives; and then the faithful servant will enter into rest, and the slothful will be called to a severe account. For man alone lives beyond death. When the Lord taketh away his breath, his soul enters on another state of existence; and his body shall at length be raised either to eternal glory or misery.—May the Lord then send forth his Spirit, and new-create our souls to holiness, and renew the face of the earth by the conversion of sinners. His power is as terrible to the workers of iniquity, as beneficial to his people: and in every way "his glory shall endure for ever: the LORD shall rejoice in his works." If he look with a frown upon the earth, it will tremble; if he touch the hills in anger, they will smoke, and kindle into a flame; and at length "the day of the LORD will come...in which the elements shall melt with fervent heat; the earth also, and all the works that are therein, shall be burnt up;" doubtless then sinners, however numerous or powerful, shall perish without hope. But they, who trust in his mercy, and love his name, shall sing his praises as long as they have their being. And if meditation on the glories of creation be so sweet to the soul, what superior glories must appear to the enlightened mind, when contemplating the great work of redemption! There all the Divine perfections, with combined splendour, beam upon the soul, exciting astonishment, love, gratitude, and joy: there spiritual riches are discerned, far more unsearchable than those temporal treasures which supply the wants of the whole visible creation; and there alone can a sinner perceive ground of confidence, and joy in God. Whilst then we thankfully receive, and use moderately, and fear to abuse, the bounty of Providence; whilst we learn to trust in him who feeds the young lions, assured that he will not desert his children; let us fix our attention and choice on "that good part, which shall never be taken from us:" and not only let us shew our gratitude by fervent songs of praise, but by devoting ourselves to the service of our God, and imitating his liberality and mercy, as we have opportunity and ability.

NOTES.

PSALM CV. V. 1, 2. (Note, 1 Chr. xvi. 7-9.) 'The first part of this psalm at least was made by David;—and it is most probable that he afterwards enlarged it, (for who else would adventure to do it?) that it might be a more complete commemoration of all the mercies of God towards their nation.' (Bp. Patrick).—Music and conversation are two things by which the mind of man receiveth much good, or a great deal of harm....They who do in reality love the Saviour, will always find themselves inclined to sing of him, and to talk of him.' (Bp. Horne.)

V. 3-7. (Notes, 1 Chr. xvi. 10-14. Marg. Ref.) V. 8-15. (Notes, 1 Chr. xvi. 15-22. Marg. Ref.) He hath remembered, &c. (8.) In Chronicles, the psalmist exhorts the people to be mindful of the covenant, which the Lord had made with their fathers; but here he teaches them to praise God for having always remembered it. (Notes, 42. Luke i. 67-75. Marg. Ref.)—Prophets. (15.) 'Meaning the old fathers to whom God shewed himself plainly, and who were settlers forth of his word.' (Note, Gen. xx. 7.)

V. 16. Famine is here figuratively spoken of, as the servant of God, which at his call promptly attends to fulfil his righteous will.—Bread is called the staff, or the support, of life: and the experience of seasons, in which corn is very scarce and dear, though short of absolute famine, give a very affecting and distressing exposition of the phrase. (Notes, Lev. xxvi. 25, 26. Is. iii. 1-9. Ez. iv. 9-17. xiv. 13-21.)

V. 17. The word translated "a man," is by some rendered an eminent man, Joseph was an eminent character, though envied by his brethren, and sold for a slave: he was a great deliverer, and one of the most illustrious types of the Saviour, in the whole Old Testament. "When God purposed to call for a famine in the land," he had sent an extraordinary man into Egypt, to make provision for Jacob's family. Joseph's brethren indeed "thought evil against him, but God meant it for good." (Notes, Gen. xxxvii. xlix. 22-26. 1. 20.)

V. 18. It seems by this, that Joseph was very severely used, when first imprisoned by Potiphar. (Notes, Gen. xxxix.)

V. 19-21. "Until his appointed time came; and the counsel of the LORD had tried him." (Old Ver.) The word which Joseph spoke, as from God, when he interpreted the dreams of the chief baker and chief butler, was reported to Pharaoh: and when Joseph had interpreted Pharaoh's extraordinary dream too; he was not only released, but likewise advanced to the highest dignity. (Notes, Gen. xl. xli. Prov. xxi. 1. Marg. Ref.) But till this time 20 The king <sup>1</sup>sent and loosed him, even the ruler of the people, and let him go free.

21 He <sup>2</sup>made him lord of his house, and ruler of all his <sup>3</sup>substance :

23 <sup>5</sup>Israel also came into Egypt ; and <sup>6</sup>Jacob sojourned in <sup>7</sup>the land of Ham.

24 And <sup>8</sup>he increased his people greatly : and <sup>9</sup>made them stronger than their enemies.

25 <sup>10</sup>He turned their heart <sup>11</sup>to hate his people, to deal subtly with his servants.

27 <sup>14</sup>They shewed <sup>15</sup>this signs among them, and <sup>16</sup>wonders in the land of Ham.

28 He <sup>17</sup>sent darkness, and made it dark ; and <sup>18</sup>they rebelled not against his word.

29 He <sup>19</sup>turned their waters into blood, and slew their fish.

30 Their land <sup>20</sup>brought forth frogs in abundance, in the chambers of their kings.

31 He spake, and <sup>21</sup>there came divers sorts of flies, <sup>22</sup>and lice in all their coasts.

33 He <sup>25</sup>smote their vines also and their fig-trees ; and brake the trees of their coasts.

arrived, Joseph continued in prison, according to "the word" or the counsel and decree, of God ; that he might be tried as gold is tried in the furnace. (Notes, lxxvi. 9-12. 1 Pet. i. 6, 7.)

V. 22. "That he should bind his princes to his will." (Old Ver.) The clause seems rather to denote the efficacious means used by Pharaoh, to secure the obedience of his princes to Joseph, than any severe measures used by Joseph himself, to punish the disobedient, or, in requiring submission to his high authority.—The Septuagint thus render the verse : "That he should instruct his princes even as himself ; and make his elders wise ; which well expresses the meaning. Perhaps the wise maxims which the elders or counsellors of Egypt, at this time, (a period far more ancient than that of any other authentic history of Egypt,) learned from Joseph, or rather from God by him, being delivered down to their successors, contributed to stamp the counsels of Egypt with that character of wisdom, for which they were celebrated in after ages. (Notes, Gen. xli. 37-44. 1 Kings iv. 30-34. Is. xix. 11-14. Acts vii. 22.)

V. 23-25. (Notes, Gen. xlii. -lxviii. Acts vii. 9-14.) At first the Egyptians were friends to Jacob's family, for Joseph's sake : but after the death of Joseph and his patron, and the succession of another king who knew not Joseph ; the Egyptians became enemies to Israel. Their rapid increase, from a single family to a powerful people, excited envy, jealousy, dread, and hatred ; which prompted both the king and his subjects to devise politic and detestable measures of diminishing their numbers and strength, and of retaining them in bondage. (Notes, Ex. i.) And as the events which had taken place, by the providential appointment of God, gave occasion to this change in the disposition of the Egyptians ; as he foresaw, and had predicted, that this would be the case ; and as he determined to leave them to themselves and the natural tendency of their depraved hearts, in such circumstances ; it is said, "he turned their hearts," &c. (Notes, Gen. xxi. 11-17. xli. 1-4. Ex. iii. 19, 20. iv. 21. viii. 18, 19. ix. 12. Ezra vi. 22. Ex. xiv. 9-11. Rom. ix. 15-21. 2 Thes. ii. 8-12.)

V. 26-28. They, &c. Moses and Aaron boldly executed their commission, in every particular. "They feared not the wrath of the king ; but endured as seeing Him that is invisible." (Note, Heb. xi. 23-37.) They were sent, like Ezekiel, to deliver the message of God to haughty rebels ; and were careful not to imitate their rebellion. (Notes, Ez. ii. 3-8.) Some, however, explain the clause of the Egyptians, reading it as an interrogation : "Did they not rebel against his word ? Did they not persist in rebelling, amidst all the plagues inflicted on them ?" (Notes, Ex. ii. -xv. Acts vii. 20-36.)

V. 29-36. (Notes, lxxviii. 42-51. Marg. Ref.)

V. 37, 38. (Marg. Ref. Notes, Ex. xii. 35-38. xiii. 17, 18. Is. lxxiii. 11-14.) "Among such a number of men, women, children, and cattle, nothing was weak and feeble, nothing unable to perform the journey. The order was that "not a hoof should be left behind ;" and he, who commanded, gave strength to obey." (Bp. Horne.)

V. 39-41. (Notes, lxxviii. 12-31. Ex. xiii. 21, 22. xvi. xvii. 1-7.)

V. 42. In this psalm the sacred writer records the goodness of God to Israel, without noticing Israel's ingratitude and rebellion ; which form in great measure the subject of the ensuing psalm. Yet he intimates, in this verse, that the Lord conferred all these benefits on them, entirely from regard to their ancestor "Abraham, his friend ;" "and to the word of his holiness," which he had spoken to Abraham. Many of the laws given to Israel were of such a nature, that they could not be obeyed in the wilderness, or at a distance from the sanctuary ; (Notes, Num. ix. 1-5. Deut. xii. 8, 9.) so that there was a special reason, why they must inhabit Canaan, in order to observe the statutes, and obey the laws, of God : but in general, all their religious advantages, and all the favours bestowed on them, were expressly vouchsafed, in order to separate them from other nations, and to render them the obedient worshippers of the true God. (Notes, Ez. xi. 17-20. xxxvi. 25-27. Luke i. 67-75. Tit. ii. 11-14. 1 Pet. i. 13-21.)—This psalm, like the preceding, and several which follow, concludes with the word Hallelu-jah. (Notes, lxxiii. 1. cvi. 1.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Our meditations on the works of the Creator, and on his providential goodness, should lead us to consider his special love to his chosen people ; that we may have more enlarged views of his glory, and be more enlivened in admiring love and gratitude.—Whilst ungodly men, by their vain songs and corrupt conversation, inflame one another's passions ; Christians should edify each other, by singing the praises of God, and by "talking of all his wondrous works ;" and the New Testament furnishes us with more sublime and interesting subjects, than even the history of Israel's deliverance from Egypt, and settlement in the promised land. (Notes, Eph. v. 15-20. Col. iii. 16, 17.) Let believers then "glory in his holy name ;" let sinners seek his face ; and let us all remember the Redeemer's "marvellous works, his wonders, and the judgments of his mouth." The Lord hath indeed remembered his covenant with Abraham, in raising up his promised "seed, in whom all the families of the earth are to be blessed ;" and we Gentiles are in him become a chosen generation, to shew forth his praises : (Note, 1 Pet. ii. 9, 10.) Indeed, true Christians have been hitherto but few in number, compared with the population of the globe ; and strangers and pilgrims upon earth ; yet a far better inheritance than that of Canaan is insured to them, by the oath and covenant of God : and if we have the unction of the Holy Spirit, no kings or people can do us harm ; but our God will reprove the greatest of those who so much as attempt to injure us.—We greatly mistake, if we do not rank afflictions among our mercies : as they tend to prove the reality of our faith and love, to humble our pride, to wean us from the world, to quicken our prayers, to enlarge our experience of the Lord's faithfulness to his promises, to encourage our dependence, to bow our hearts into submission, and to soften them into compassion to our brethren. (Notes, Rom. v. 3-5. 2 Cor. i. 1-7. iv. 13-18. Heb. xii. 5-11. Jam. i. 2-4. 1 Pet. i. 6, 7. iv. 12-16.)—When the Lord calls, famines obey his word ; and by withholding bread he breaks "the staff of life," to punish the iniquities of guilty nations, and to exercise the faith and patience of his people. But he will assuredly provide for those, who trust in him : and he often previously makes arrangements, in order to supply those wants of which his servants had no foresight. Thus, in his foreknowledge of our lost estate, long before we had an existence, he appointed his beloved Son, whom Joseph typified, to be our Redeemer. In the fulness of time he appeared on earth in "the form of a servant ;" and though perfectly holy, he was accused of grievous crimes, treated with the utmost insult, crucified, and laid in the grave ; and by these sufferings he paid the ransom of our souls. At the appointed time the bands of death

PSALM CVI.

The psalmist praises God, admires the happiness of his people, and prays to partake of it, 1-5. He recapitulates Israel's provocations: from their bondage in Egypt, to the time when they were settled in Canaan, and imitated the idolatries of the Canaanites, 6-40. He concludes with prayer and praise, 47, 48.

"PRAISE ye the LORD: 'O give thanks unto the LORD; for he is good; for his mercy endureth for ever.

2 'Who can utter the mighty acts of the LORD? who can shew forth 'all his praise?

3 'Blessed are they that 'keep judgment, and he that 'doeth righteousness 'at all times.

4 'Remember me, O LORD, with the favour that thou bearest unto thy people: O 'visit me with thy salvation:

5 That 'I may see the good of thy chosen, that I may 'rejoice in the gladness of thy nation, that 'I may glory with thine inheritance.

6 We have 'sinned with our fathers, we have committed iniquity, we have done wickedly.

were loosed, and by his resurrection he was fully justified from all which had been charged upon him: he was then exalted by the right hand of the Father, to the mediatorial throne; all the treasures of grace and salvation are entirely at his disposal; and perishing sinners come to him, and are relieved from his inexhaustible stores. But with this example in view, we can expect nothing else, than humiliation and hardship, before honour and usefulness on earth, and complete felicity in heaven. We should then prepare for the cross, and for the hatred of the world: we should submit to the will of our God, and wait his time, and commit our all to his disposal: and in the depth of our distress, the case of Joseph also may teach us to hope for speedy and important changes in our circumstances, even in this present world. Nor is it improper to observe, that Jesus hath power to bind kings and princes at his will; (Notes, ii. 10-12. cxlix. 7-9. Rev. vi. 12-17;) and that he alone can teach senators true wisdom.—As the believer commonly is most prosperous in his soul, when under the cross; so the church hath often flourished most in holiness, and increased in number, under oppression and persecution.—But the image and favour of God are sure to excite the enmity of wicked men; whose hearts will thus be turned to hate his servants, and to join force with subtlety to destroy them: and that, which ungodly counsellors think a wise political measure, often proves, on examination, to be a most detestable project of the devil against the church of Christ. Yet instruments shall be raised up for her good, suited to her emergencies: and multiplied plagues may be expected by obstinate persecutors, who persist in their rebellion under the gentler strokes of God's correcting rod. The whole creation is ready to rise up in arms against his enemies; and when he gives the word, every thing will concur to render them contemptible and miserable. He will fulfil his largest promises to his people, and make them a terror to those who hate them: and all the benefits conferred on Israel, as a nation, were only shadows of the "spiritual blessings with which he hath blessed us in Jesus Christ." Having redeemed us with his blood, enriched us from his treasures, restored our souls to health and holiness, and set us at liberty from Satan's bondage; he guides and guards us all the way; he satisfies our souls with the bread of heaven, and with the water of life from the rock of salvation, and will bring us safe to our incorruptible inheritance.—But let it never for a moment be forgotten, that the Lord, by all he doeth for us, intends to teach, incline, and enable us, to "observe his statutes, and keep his laws;" and to shew forth his praise, first here on earth, and then in heaven for ever; and that he "redeems" his servants "from all iniquity, and purifies them unto himself, a peculiar people, zealous of good works."

NOTES.

PSALM CVI. V. 1. Praise ye the LORD. Hallelujah. (Note cv. 45.) 'There is little doubt... but this is the title of the psalm... whereby the author excites them to acknowledge God's bounty to their ungrateful forefathers.'—(Bp. Patrick).—Many commentators affix a very late date to this psalm; supposing it to have been written during the Babylonish captivity, or even so long after as the prosecution of Antiochus Epiphanes. (Note, 37, 38.) But the concluding verses, on which they ground that opinion, is found for substance in the psalm which was used when David removed the ark to mount Zion. (Note, 1 Chr. xvi. 35, 36.)—Indeed this seems to be an appendix to the preceding psalm: for as that celebrated the mercies of God to Israel (Notes, cv.) so this confesses and deprecates the rebellions of Israel against God.—'The prophet exhorteth the people to praise God for his past benefits, that hereby their minds may be strengthened against all present troubles and despair.' (Notes, cxxxvi. 1. Ezra iii. 11. Jer. xxxiii. 11.)

V. 2. 'When you glorify the LORD, exalt him as much as you can; for even yet he will far exceed: and when you exalt him, put forth your whole strength, and be not weary; for he can never go far enough.' (Ecclesiasticus xliii. 30.) (Marg. Ref. Note, Neh. ix. 5.)

V. 3. The Israelites had been put in possession of Canaan, by the immediate power of JEHOVAH, "that they might keep his statutes, and observe his laws;" (Note, cv. 45:) and they would have been very happy, if they had thus "kept judgment, and done righteousness at all times;" that is, if they had persevered in attendance on the ordinances, and in obedience to the commandments, of God, (Notes, i. 1—3. xxxii. 1, 2. lxxxi. 13—16. cxix. 1—5. Matt. v. 1—12. Luke xi. 27, 28.) But though Israel, as a nation, had lost much of their prosperity by sin; yet every individual, who thus ordered his conduct, was and would be happy. No mere man indeed obeys God perfectly; yet every true believer makes this his constant aim, nor shall we ever be perfectly happy till we are perfectly obedient; that is, till fully delivered from sin and all its consequences. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 4, 5. The psalmist well understood the difference between the nation of Israel, and the true Israelites found among them. (Notes, lxxiii. 1. John i. 47—51. Rom. ii. 25—29. ix. 6, 9.) He was one of that nation, and shared all its external privileges: but his desire and prayer was, that he might be remembered with the favour or gracious forgiveness and acceptance, shewn to the true people of God, and visited with their salvation; and that he might see, and share the blessings, the joy, and the triumphs, on earth and in heaven, of those who are indeed "a chosen generation, a holy nation," and the Lord's highly valued inheritance. (Note, 1 Pet. ii. 9, 10.) Many expositors understand these verses merely of the temporal felicity promised to Israel when obedient: but that was only a shadow of the spiritual and eternal blessings, ensured to the elect of God; and scarcely any passage of the New Testament breathes out a more fervent longing after those spiritual blessings, than this does. (Notes, li. 12, 13. cxix. 41, 42. 81, 82. 123. 132. 166. Gen. xlix. 18. 1 Sam. ii. 1. Is. xlix. 5, 6. Luke ii. 25—32. iii. 4—6. 1 Cor. i. 26—31. Phil. iii. 1—7. Marg. Ref.)

V. 6. 'We are no better than our forefathers; but have offended after their example, by which we ought to have been amended. We are guilty of many iniquities against one another, and much impiety against thee.' (Bp. Patrick) (Notes, Ezra ix. 6, 7. Dan. ix. 7—10.)

V. 7. The Israelites in general did not so understand the miracles wrought for them in Egypt, as to expect deliverance from the love and power of God; nor were they suitably impressed or affected by what they had heard and seen, when pursued by the Egyptians to the banks of the Red sea: so that they soon provoked the Lord by their unbelief and distrustful murmurs. (Notes, Ez. xiv. 10—12. Marg. Ref.)

V. 8. 'He gave them a new deliverance, that the world might not imagine he wanted power to complete what he had begun to do for them.' (Bp. Patrick.) (Notes, Ex. xiv. 13—18. Is. lxiv. 1—3. Ez. xx. 7—9.)

V. 9—11. Notes, Ex. xiv. 19—31. xv. 1—20. Is. li. 9—11. lxxiii. 7—14. Heb. xi. 29.

V. 12—14. The faith of the Israelites was exactly the same, as is represented by "the seed sown upon stony ground," and widely different from that which springs up in a broken penitent heart. (Note, Matt. xiii. 20, 21.) They were surprised, gratified, and delighted, by their unexpected escape, and the destruction of their enemies: and they experienced a mighty flow of natural joy and gratitude, such as may be observed in children when they are humoured. (Note, Ex. xiv. 26—31.) But there was no humiliation for sin; no abiding apprehensions of the glorious perfections of JEHOVAH; no steady reliance on his power, wisdom, truth, and love; no submission to his will, or preparation for self-denying obedience: and therefore in time of temptation they fell away, having no root in themselves; and when their wishes were thwarted, they murmured, rebelled, forgot the works of God, would not wait for his counsel; but lusted exceedingly in the wilderness, and tempted God by their unbelief. (Notes, &c. Ex. xv. xvi. xvii. x. 1—2. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 15. Instead of being benefited by the abundance of the quails sent them, the Israelites surfeited through excess, and multitudes died by disease. (Notes, Num. xi. 4—35.)—They "knew not what they asked," or "what manner of spirit they were of:" and their sensual request was granted as a punishment. (Notes, lxxviii. 17—31. Is. x. 16—19. xxiv. 16. 3 John 1—4.)

16 They 'envied Moses also in the camp, and Aaron 'the saint of the LORD.

17 'The earth opened and swallowed up Dathan, and covered the company of Abiram.

18 And 'a fire was kindled in their company; the flame burned up the wicked.

19 They 'made a calf in Horeb, and worshipped the molten image.

20 Thus 'they changed their glory 'into the similitude of an ox that eateth grass.

21 They 'forgot 'God their Saviour, 'which had done great things in Egypt;

22 'Wondrous works in the land of Ham, and 'terrible things by the Red sea.

23 Therefore 'he said that he would destroy them, had not Moses 'his chosen 'stood before him in the breach, to turn away his wrath, lest he should destroy them.

24 Yea, 'they despised 'the 'pleasant land, 'they believed not his word:

25 But 'murmured in their tents, and 'hearkened not unto the voice of the LORD.

26 'Therefore he 'lifted up his hand against them, to overthrow them in the wilderness:

27 To 'overthrow their seed also among the nations, and 'to scatter them in the lands.

28 They 'joined themselves also unto 'Baal-peor, and ate the sacrifices of the dead.

29 Thus they provoked him to anger 'with their inventions: and 'the plague brake in upon them.

30 Then 'stood up Phinehas, and executed judgment: and so the plague was stayed.

31 And 'that was counted unto him for righteousness unto all generations for evermore.

(Horne.)—The place, even Horeb, where the Israelites made and worshipped the calf, and all the preceding miracles of mercy to them, and judgment on their enemies, which they had witnessed, constituted so many highly aggravating circumstances of their base and ungrateful conduct. And by parity of reason, is not the idolatry of professed Christians, especially of such as have access to the oracles of God, proportionably more heinous and inexcusable, than that of poor benighted pagans? the idolatry of papists, than that of the Chinese?—Moses stood before God, in behalf of Israel, by fervent prayer: but when he stood before Israel, protesting against their wickedness, and executing judgment on the idolaters; he was equally employed for the good of the nation, and his exertions were equally efficacious in preventing their destruction. dead men; and the idols of the gentiles were generally warriors, kings, or lawgivers, whom they deified when dead, as the papists worship dead saints.

V. 32, 33. (Notes, Num. xx.) "The wrath of man" found admission, and that "worketh not the righteousness of God." Thou, blessed Jesus, art the only perfect pattern of patience and love! O grant to all, but above all, to the pastors of thy flock, a spirit not easy to be provoked, and lips not hasty to speak unadvisedly. (Horne.)—'If so notable a prophet of God escape not punishment, though others provoked him to sin, how much more shall they be subject to God's judgment, who cause God's children to sin!' (Notes, Num. xxvii. 12-17. Deut. i. 3-7. iii. 23-28. Marg. Ref.)

V. 34. God commissioned Israel to execute his righteous sentence of extermination on the Canaanites, who had filled up the measure of their crimes; and, while many in every age declaim against them for the supposed cruelty of their conduct in this respect, they are repeatedly in Scripture charged with guilt for sparing those whom God had doomed to death; and their crime was awfully punished by its consequences. (Notes, Num. xxxi. 2. 14-18. xxxii. 51-56. Deut. vii. 1-4. Josh. vi. 21. xxii. 12, 13. Judg. ii. 1-5.)

V. 35-38. (Notes, lxxviii. 56-60. 1 Kings xvii. 7-17. Jer. ii. 10-13. 33-37. Ez. xvi. 15-22. xx. 25, 26. xxiii. 39. Marg. Ref.)—Devils, (37.) (Note, Deut. xxxii. 17.)—No instance is recorded in which the Israelites were guilty of this most horrid crime, till long after the days of David; and this circumstance seems to favour the opinion, that the psalm was composed by some other person, during the captivity. The Israelites, however, in the days of the judges might imitate the idolaters among whom they lived, in this, as well as in their other abominations; though it is not expressly recorded. And no allusion is made in any part of the psalm to the rebellions and idolatries of the kings of Judah, or of Israel, to the golden calves worshipped by the latter, or to the profanations of the temple by the former; yet these are prominent subjects in the enumeration given by other inspired writers, of the crimes which provoked God to cast off Israel, and to punish Judah by the Babylonish captivity; and would scarcely have been passed over in entire silence, if the psalm had been written after those events.—Indeed, it would be wonderful, in that case, that nothing should be said, either about the temple, or Jerusalem, or any of the kings of Judah, good or bad.

PSALM CVII.

Exhortations to praise God, for redemption from captivity, and guidance in perilous journeys to a safe habitation, 1-9; for deliverance from prison, 10-16; for recovery from sickness, 17-22; for preservation when in imminent danger of shipwreck, 23-31; and for the care of his providence over the affairs of men, 32-43.

O *GIVE thanks unto the LORD, for he is *good: *for his mercy endureth for ever.

2 Let *the redeemed of the LORD say so, whom he hath redeemed *from the hand of the enemy; referred to in the margin, form a full comment on these verses. (Notes, Lev. xxvi. 11, 12. Deut. xxxii. 19, 20. Zech. xi. 7-9.)

V. 46. Had the several nations, into whose hands God successively sold Israel for their sins, determined on extirpating them, as they had the Canaanites, there was, in many instances, nothing sufficient to hinder them; but the Lord inclined the hearts of the conquerors to compassionate their slaves and captives, and thus the effects of their vehement resentment were prevented. The Israelites, being pitied, were only impoverished and enslaved, and not destroyed. (Notes, Ezra vi. 22. vii. 27, 28. Jer. xlii. 12.)

V. 47, 48. (Note, 1 Chr. xvi. 35, 36.)—If David did not write this psalm, but it was composed by some prophet during the captivity, the writer took this passage from David's psalm, and applied it to the state of the Jews in his own time.—Indeed, the words are very applicable to the present condition of the Jews; and will doubtless be used by them when the veil shall be taken from their hearts, and they shall turn to the Lord. (Notes, xli. 11-13. lxxii. 17-19. lxxxix. 52. Neh. ix. 5. Matt. v. 13.)—‘Let the great LORD of all the world, who has been so gracious to Israel as to choose them for his own peculiar people, be most heartily blessed and praised. Let all generations bless him, as long as the world shall last, and to eternity; and let all his people concur in these desires, and wish it may be so. Let them all praise the LORD, and desire that he may be praised.’ (Bp. Patrick.)—Triumph, &c. (47.) “Glory in thy praise.” (1 Chr. xvi. 35.) The original word is the same in both places.—This psalm also concludes with HALLELUJAH.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1-27. None of our sins or sufferings should prevent our ascribing glory and praise to the Lord, and thanking him for his undeserved and everlasting goodness and mercy. Indeed, the more unworthy we are, the more admirable is his kindness in continuing to us any of our comforts and hopes. “But who can utter the mighty acts of the LORD, or shew forth all his praise!” This as much exceeds our ability, as it does to fulfil the whole of his righteous law without defect or failure; yet they, who depend on the Redeemer's righteousness, will copy the example of his persevering obedience, and endeavour, both by word and deed, to shew forth his praises as they are able. These are indeed a happy people; for sin is the only cause of all the misery in the universe. How absurd, then, is it for men to amuse themselves with the notion of a religion, which they fancy will save and bless them, without rendering them obedient to the will of God!—Multitudes, indeed, abuse their outward privileges, and many professed Christians run into extravagant sentiments, and inconsistent practices; yet God hath a people in every age who enjoy his favour, and experience the power and comfort of his salvation; whom he hath chosen to himself, and to whom he will do good; who are holy and happy under his government and protection; and for whom gladness, and victory, and eternal glory are reserved. Let us pray earnestly and constantly to be thus remembered and distinguished, and to participate their privileges and felicity. We shall not be excluded from this favour, though “we have sinned with our fathers, and done very wickedly,” if, indeed, we are truly humbled for our iniquities.—But when man is left to himself, no miracles, mercies, warnings, or judgments, will, deeply and durably, influence his heart to trust and serve the Lord. We have, then, no right to charge our misery upon our father's sins, seeing we have copied, and, perhaps, exceeded them; rather, we should be humbled, to reflect how we arise, one generation after another, “an increase of sinful men, to provoke the LORD to anger;” so that, if he did not save us for his own name's sake, and to the praise of his glorious power and grace, we should all perish without remedy.—In reviewing our past lives, we shall often find that the timing of our rebellions has exceedingly aggravated the guilt of them. We have, perhaps, distrusted the LORD, after having just before experienced his merciful interpositions in our favour. When remarkable deliverances have excited a transient joy and gratitude, we have speedily forgotten all, and relapsed into murmurs and disobedience! Under distress of conscience, we have, perhaps, been ready to say to the LORD, ‘Save our souls, and deal with us in all other things as thou pleasest;’ yet, it may be, ere long we have grown impatient of poverty and hardship, have lusted after some worldly indulgence, and tempted instead of trusting Providence; and thus have we provoked God to send “leanness into our souls,” or to inflict severe corrections upon us, in order to bring us to a sense of our folly. We cannot but know that we have often given way to envy, ambition, and self-preference; and instead of sitting down quietly “in the lowest place” of his church, (which is far too good for such vile sinners,) and rejoicing in the gifts and usefulness of his saints and ministers, we have been secretly repining, or openly rivaling or censuring them. So that, even the believer will see abundant cause to say, “It is of the LORD's mercies that I am not consumed,” after the example of Korah and his company. Often have we, forgetful of the terrors of mount Sinai, and of the scene exhibited on mount Calvary, and of our marvellous deliverance from the hand of our enemy, been setting up idols in our hearts, and cleaving to some forbidden object; so that, if a greater than “Moses had not stood in the breach, to turn away the anger of the LORD;” we should have provoked him to destroy us. Even though we have not entirely disbelieved the word of God, or despised the heavenly inheritance, yet the feebleness of our desires, and the weakness of our faith, and our eagerness about worldly things, have frequently argued a very perverse, ungrateful, and carnal frame of spirit.

In short, we have put the patience of the Lord himself to trial, and no other could have borne with us; we have brought upon ourselves many rebukes and corrections; we have continual reason to join humiliation with our gratitude; and though the Lord has many a time delivered us, and renewed our comforts, yet we have again provoked him, and have been brought low for our iniquity. Still, however, mercy hath prevailed; he hath heard our prayers, remembered his covenant, and spared us for his name's sake.

V. 28-48. If the real Christian's review of his past conduct affords so much ground for humiliation, the case of professed Christians is still worse. A great part of the visible church has forgotten God our Saviour, and turned aside to the worship of molten images, saints, and angels; changing, like Israel, their “glory into the similitude” of their fellow-creatures. Vast multitudes seem desirous of discarding the God and Saviour of the Bible, and substituting in his place, a philosophical deity, not indeed the work of their own hands, but the creature of their own imaginations, and no more a just resemblance of JEHOVAH, than the golden calf was. Among those who do not adopt such sentiments, we find conformity to the world, in its vainest if not most criminal practices; the indulgence, instead of the mortification, of every carnal lust; nay, an imitation of the lewdness, excesses, extortions, oppressions, and cruelties of the heathen, even to the polluting of the lands where they live, with the blood of vast multitudes sacrificed to their avarice. And numbers train up their children in vanity and vice, and in contempt of every thing sacred; as if they meant that they should be devoted to Satan, and were determined to murder their precious souls. Whilst nations professing Christianity are, openly and generally, guilty of such enormities; no wonder that the wrath of the Lord is kindled against them; and if, after repeated deliverances, he brings them very low for their iniquities; except a general and deep repentance, and “works meet for repentance,” intervene, there can be no prospect but of increasing calamities and confusion. It would be well, if those, who fill up the important stations of legislators and magistrates, were inspired with the intrepid zeal of Phinehas, to execute judgment upon daring criminals: this would be “accounted to them for righteousness” by the Judge of the world, however it were blamed by the criminals, or their abettors. Every one of us, however, should imitate Moses, by “standing in the breach to turn away the wrath” of God from a guilty land; both by our earnest and persevering prayers, and by our zealous endeavours to promote reformation, and the revival of true religion, in our several circles. But it behoves us, in our zeal against sin, and sinners, to watch over our own passions and expressions; lest we speak unadvisedly with our lips, and it should go ill with us also for their sakes.—Our general duty is, however, the most pleasant and the safest; and when many are left in any church or nation, who attend to the duties of their several stations, there remains a hope that God will turn away his wrath, and not destroy them. Let us then beseech him to separate his church, and to distinguish his professed people, from the heathen, by his sanctifying grace; and to unite them in love, that they may “give thanks unto his holy name, and triumph in his praise.” Let us beseech him to bring again into his church the poor dispersed Jews: let us bless his name for our peculiar mercies, and desire that our God may be universally and everlastingly praised; and that all the people of the earth may say, “Amen; Hallelujah.”

NOTES.

PSALM CVII. V. 1-7. It is probable that this psalm was composed by David, if he indeed were the author of the two preceding psalms: as those relate to the LORD's dealings with Israel; and this calls our attention to his providential care of mankind in general. But, whilst we primarily notice the literal sense; we shall also perceive, that the instances, which are selected are pictures, or similitudes, of the blessings pertaining to salvation.—There seems in these verses some reference to the deliverance of Israel out of Egypt, their wanderings in the desert, and their settlement in Canaan; yet they do not exactly, or exclusively, apply to these events. The Israelites were not gathered out of the lands, from the east, west, north, and south: but they were redeemed from the power of Pharaoh; and wandered in the wilderness, and hungered and thirsted, and were led far round, yet in a right way; (Notes, Deut. viii.) For a long time, they “found no city to dwell in,” (Note, Num. xiv. 27-30;) at length they were settled in a land, where cities were ready prepared for them, and where they were abundantly satisfied with every earthly blessing.—The case of travellers in those countries seems also referred to. A number of people, collected from all quarters, march together through the sandy deserts; where they are liable to be assaulted by freebooters, and are in danger of losing their way, or of perishing by hunger and thirst. But when they are in trouble, and call upon the LORD, he delivers them from their enemies and dangers, and guides them, in his providence, to the cities which they mean to inhabit.—The words likewise exactly describe the case of those, whom the LORD hath redeemed from the bondage of Satan, and collected from all parts of the earth; who pass through the world as a perilous and dreary wilderness; who are often ready to faint through troubles, fears, and temptations; who learn to call upon the LORD in every danger and difficulty, and are guarded, fed, and refreshed, till they at length arrive at that city, which the LORD hath prepared for their habitation; where their longing souls will be for ever satisfied with his goodness.—Perhaps the recovery of the Jews from their dispersions, was also predicted; as the conclusion of the foregoing psalm seems peculiarly applicable to their present condition (Note, cvi. 47, 48. Marg. Ref.)

V. 8, 9. "They shall acknowledge," (or, "Let them acknowledge,") to JEHOVAH, his mercy, and his wonders to the children of Adam, &c. The kindness and compassion of God to the sons of fallen Adam, in abundantly supplying their temporal wants, demands the return of admiring praise and thanksgiving: but his mercy, in providing for the spiritual wants of perishing sinners, and thus satisfying the longing soul, and filling the hungry soul with goodness, is most astonishing: and to eternity every one of the redeemed, with all his powers, will celebrate this goodness of the Lord, and his wonderful works to the sons of Adam. (Notes, xxxiv. 9, 10. xxxvi. 5-9. civ. 27-30. Luke i. 46-55.) Our translation is not strictly literal; yet it gives the evident sense of the passage; and it has a peculiar animation, as repeated after every instance of the Divine goodness and mercy. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 10-16. The psalmist next selected the case of prisoners delivered from their confinement. We are led to conceive of persons shut up in a dark and unwholesome dungeon, barricaded on ever side by gates of brass and bars of iron, and loaded with galling fetters; condemned to die, and hourly expecting to be led to execution. This they are supposed to have merited by their crimes; having both violated the laws of man, and rebelled against the word of God. In this deplorable condition, bowed down with pain and anguish of spirit, they are represented as praying to the Lord; and, by his power over the hearts and affairs of men, as marvelously set at liberty. Multitudes, through successive generations, have doubtless experienced such an unmerited and unexpected escape: and the deliverance of the Jews from their captivity in Babylon, must occur to the mind of the attentive reader, with many particular instances recorded in Scripture. (Notes, 2 Kings xxv. 27-30. 2 Chr. xxxiii. 11-19. Marg. Ref.)—But it is also a shadow of the sinner's deliverance from a far worse confinement. By rebellion against God, men are brought under the condemnation of his holy law; and Satan, by means of their lusts, hath obtained dominion over them, and holds them fast in the most miserable bondage. This the awakened sinner discovers, and becomes sensible of his guilt, misery, and danger: and, having struggled hard, but in vain, for deliverance, he finds there is no help for him but in the mercy and grace of God. For this he seeks by earnest prayer: and thus he receives liberty and peace. (Notes, Is. xlv. 1-6. lxx. 9-13. lli. 2, 3. lx. 1-3. Zech. ix. 11, 12. Luke iv. 16-22. Acts xxvi. 16-18.)—Let us revert to the poor prisoner before described: if a free pardon be sent him, his chains are soon knocked off; the gates and bars of iron and brass fly open; the jailor hath no longer power to detain him, the gloom, horror, and despair of the dungeon are exchanged for the cheerful light of the sun and the wholesome air; the company of malefactors, the presence of the keeper, the rattling of chains, the expectation of the executioner with the implements of death, and the squalid attire of a prison, are changed for his own house, the society and congratulations of his friends and relatives, and all the comforts of liberty. All this is in a measure the case with the true Christian in this world: but at the resurrection, when the gates of the grave shall be thrown open, and sin and death shall be finally done with; his deliverance and his gratitude will together be perfected. (Note, 8, 9. Marg. Ref.)

V. 17-22. The next selected case is that of recovery from sickness, especially when it hath been the effect of licentiousness, or iniquity: for though all diseases spring from sin, yet some are more immediately the effect of men's personal transgressions. (Note, John v. 10-15.) The righteous providence of God hath connected several loathsome and dreadful diseases, with different kinds of excessive or forbidden gratifications: yet men rush forward without regard to consequences: thus, "fools, because of their transgressions, are afflicted." Loss of strength and appetite are attended with excessive pain, and death presents itself before their affrighted minds: then the most profane will sometimes cry unto the Lord; and though their prayer is often the mere instinctive voice of distress, and only means, "Torment me not; yet he frequently hears them, and unexpectedly restores their health and strength. (Notes, Job xxxiii. 19-30.)—Probably, Christ by his powerful word healed some of this description when he was on earth: and all his miracles were emblematic of his healing the worst diseases of our souls. We are as fallen creatures, prone to pride, ambition, envy, malice, covetousness, and sensual lusts: but most men exceedingly increase these fatal distempers by habits of indulgence. The convinced sinner knows that these maladies must terminate in hopeless misery, unless cured; and he finds by experience, that he can increase, but cannot remedy them: he even feels his carnal inclination recoil at those things, which should be the nourishment of his soul, and he often apprehends that his destruction is inevitable. But he cries unto the Lord in this emergency, and by his word and Spirit his soul is gradually restored to health and holiness.—The original is future, "He will save." &c. implying an encouragement to all, in every age and land, who feel their misery, to cry unto God for help: and a call on those who are helped to bless God, for his mercies, and to excite others to seek the same blessings. (Note 8, 9.)—Sacrifice, &c. (22.) (Marg. Ref.)

V. 23-30. The case of mariners is next selected. They transact their business upon the unstable and tempestuous ocean; and there witness scenes, and experience deliverances, of which others can scarcely form a conception. When, at the command of that God, whom the winds and waves obey, a storm ariseth; their situation becomes most tremendous, and it seems every moment as if the vessel must be swallowed up by the raging billows. In this perilous situation, the most courageous are often dismayed: they are tossed about by the violent motion of the vessel; as if they staggered through drunkenness; and, being baffled in all their efforts, "all their wisdom is swallowed up," and the most skilful and experienced are at a loss what further to do, to escape impending death. But when they call upon the Lord in their distress, they are often rescued, as from the very jaws of destruction, by the ceasing of the storm, or by some unexpected way of escape; and their terror is succeeded by pro-portionable gladness, when they arrive safe at their destined harbour. (Notes, Jon. i. 4-16. Matt. viii. 24-27. Acts xxvii. 14-44.) This too may be a picture of those terrors and that distress of conscience, which many experience, when they first apply their minds to religion: and of those deep scenes of trouble and temptation, which some, far more than others, pass through, in their subsequent course: in which, like Job, they seem to be set up as marks, at which Satan is permitted to shoot all his fiery darts; and by every suggestion to fill them with hard thoughts of God, and desperate conclusions concerning themselves. These are, like the mariner, exposed to tempests unknown to others; and are sometimes almost at their wit's end: yet in answer to their cries, the Lord turns their storms into a calm, and causes their trials to terminate in gladness and praise. (Note, Job iii. 1. ix. 14-21. P. O. 14-35.)

V. 31, 32. 'Oh that they, who are thus unexpectedly preserved, would never forget to make their thankful acknowledgments to the Lord for his singular kindness; but every where proclaim what wonders he hath done for them!—Let them magnify his power and goodness in the great assemblies of the people, especially in his temple.—Let them praise him in the supreme court of the kingdom; that judges and governors may be excited to make Him their trust and confidence.' (Bp. Patrick.) (Notes, xxii. 22-24. xl. 9, 10. cxix. 46. cxxviii. 4. 5. Matt. x. 16-18.)

V. 33-43. The righteous Lord effects changes as he pleases, in the face of nature and the affairs of nations; drying up rivers, and turning well-watered fertile countries into barren deserts, for the wickedness of the inhabitants. Thus Canaan itself is now remarkable for its sterility. (Note, Deut. xxix. 20-25.)—On the contrary, other regions, which were barren and uncultivated, in the course of his providence become most fruitful and flourishing; where colonies of destitute persons build cities, cultivate the lands, and are blessed and increased exceedingly. (Note, 1-7.)—The casting of the Jews out of the church, and the preaching of the gospel to the Gentiles, answer to this picture. The well-watered and fruitful soil is become dry and barren: while the wilderness is filled with pools of water and wells of salvation. (Notes, Is. xlii. 13-16. xxx. 23-25. xxxii. 15-20. xxxv. 1. 2. 5-7. xli. 17-20. xlii. 14-21. xlv. 3-5. lv. 12, 13.) The gospel flourished for a time exceedingly amongst the Gentiles; but it has been brought low and minished, in different places, through oppression and persecution, and internal corruptions or divisions: yet contempt hath repeatedly been poured upon persecuting princes; and even upon such as, pretending friendship, have attempted to lord it over God's heritage; so that they have been bewildered and infatuated in their counsels, like men who have lost their way: (Notes, 2 Kings iii. 7-14. Is. xxiii. 8, 9.) whilst the poor and persecuted church of God has been revived from the dust, and again increased and prospered. This will be more eminently the case in future times, when the righteous will see it and rejoice, and all iniquity will be finally silenced. (Notes, Rom. ii. 4-6. iii. 19, 20.) In the mean while, the wise will notice these varied dispensations of providence, and will learn to walk in those ways, in which the lovingkindness of the Lord may be understood and experienced. (Notes, lxxv. 7-9. Hos. xiv. 9.)—A truly wise person will treasure up in his heart the contents of this most instructive and delightful psalm. By so doing, he will fully understand—the weakness and wretchedness of man, and the lovingkindness of God; who, not for our merits, but for his mercy's sake, dispelleth our ignorance, breaketh off our sins, healeth our infirmities, preserveth us in temptations, placeth us in the church, enricheth us with his grace, sheltereth us from persecution, blesseth us in time, and will crown us in eternity.' (Bp. Horne.)—Barrenness, (34.) Saltness, (Marg.) (Notes, Gen. xiv. 1-3. Deut. xxix. 20-25. Ez. xlviii. 11.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1-22. Wherever we turn our thoughts, we perceive the effects of the Lord's goodness and mercy, which should excite our grateful praises: but the redeemed alone will unfeignedly thank him even for providential benefits.—The bible instructs us, and faith will enable us, to perceive the hand of God in those events, which unbelief ascribes to chance, to second causes, or subordinate agents, (Note, Luke x. 30-37.) Whatever means or instruments are employed, the Lord is the great agent. We should therefore mark his operations in the ordinary occurrences of life, and render him thanks for every instance of his kindness to us and to our connections.—When we have been preserved or delivered from hostile invasions, and the assaults of robbers and assassins; when we are brought safe home from long or perilous journeys; when provided for with things needful for our bodies, placed in convenient habitations, or enjoying domestic comforts; how pleasant and right is it, that we should "praise the Lord for his goodness, and for his wonderful works" to us, the sinful children of fallen Adam! But, alas! we are most apt to forget the hand of God, when every thing corresponds to our wishes: and therefore he brings us into trouble and danger, that we may feel our dependence, and call upon him for deliverance; and that, when our desires are granted, we may either render him our tribute of praise, or be left inexcusable in our neglect.—Sin is always to be considered as the source of all our troubles; which we might justly be left to struggle with, or to sink under, without help from that God, against whom we have rebelled, and whose counsel we have rejected. But there are many afflictions, which are the immediate consequences of men's crimes. Such are especially, in most instances, the horrors of a prison, and the prospect of an ignominious death. Yet, alas! how many are in this dreadful situation, brought down with anguish of heart, and having none to help them! And when such persons unexpectedly obtain liberty and all its comforts, how should they praise the Lord for his goodness to them! Yet it is but seldom that their sorrows and terrors are productive of genuine humiliation before God, and fervent prayer unto him: and therefore they commonly return to their former courses, and perish at last more inexcusable and unpitied.—Thus also infatuated multitudes entail upon themselves months and years of disease and pain, by moments of licentious indulgence: and if, in answer to their cries of distress, the Lord bring them back from the gates of death, surely they should praise him for his goodness, and sacrifice to him the sacrifices of thanksgiving, with fervency equal to their great unworthiness of such favour, and proportioned to the consequences of dying in such a manner! Yet whilst thousands are cured in our hospitals, and by various charities, as well as in other ways, of diseases contracted by licentiousness and excess; it is to be feared that, a very small number excepted, they generally manifest their ingratitude, by returning to their former excesses; and the event generally illustrates the benevolence as well as wisdom and piety, of fervently exclaiming, "Oh that men would praise the Lord for his goodness, and for his wonderful works to the children of men? That they would offer the sacrifices of thanksgiving, and declare his works with rejoicing." (Note, Luke xvii. 11-19. P. O. 11-19.)

V. 23-43. The perils to which seamen are exposed, are not commonly the effect of their own transgressions, but as they "do their business in great waters," they see so much of the wonderful works of God; that their too general irreligion forms one of the most lamentable demonstrations of the depravity of the human heart. If we were strangers to these truths and facts, we should expect that they, who had once beheld the storm arise in obedience to the Creator's will, and had experienced the horrors of the tremendous scene, which baffles all description, with that dismay and astonishment which must be inseparable from the idea of being every moment liable to be swallowed up by the raging billows, without being able to do any thing to prevent it; who, in their extreme distress had cried unto the Lord for help, and had, in some marvellous manner, been unexpectedly preserved, and restored in peace to the desired haven; that they, I say, would certainly unite fervent gratitude with their overflowing gladness; and not only employ their tongues, but spend the remnant of their days to the glory of their great preserver, "Exalting him in the congregation of the people, and praising him in the assembly of the elders." This ought uniformly to be the case; but how evident is the general and awful reverse!—Indeed, the surprising changes which are continually taking place in the affairs of nations, families, and individuals, whilst some are cast down from the summit of prosperity, and others advanced from the depth of adversity, evince our absolute dependence upon God in every thing, and shew that neglect of him, or rebellion against him, are as unreasonable as they are wicked. (Note, cxlii. 7-9. 1 Sam. ii. 4-8.) The fertility and populousness of nations depend on his sovereign will: and he effects what changes he pleases, for the display of his justice, or his mercy. In his providence, a few poor hungry outcasts have sometimes migrated into a waste howling wilderness, and have there been enabled to build cities, and to cultivate the before barren desert; and so have become prosperous, and multiplied exceedingly; yet, after a time, perhaps, affluence has introduced luxury and impiety; and for their punishment they have been minished and brought low by oppression and public calamities. He who set them up when afflicted and poor, pours contempt upon them when they are become powerful princes, and, perhaps, reduces them to their former abject state. The righteous, beholding these judgments of God, will rejoice in his just and gracious sovereignty; and thus, from time to time, iniquity receives a check, and infidelity stands confuted: and he that is truly wise, will observe these things, and will be encouraged in trusting and waiting for the lovingkindness of the Lord.—But the same persons will see still more of the wisdom, power, and love of God, in his dealings with his church of redeemed sinners, whom he hath gathered from the east, the west, the north, and the south, to be unto him a peculiar people. Having redeemed them from the power of the enemy, he guides them through this desolate wilderness to his holy habitation. Having caused them to hunger and thirst after righteousness, when they were ready to faint and perish, he supplied their wants from his abundant stores; having taught them to seek help from him, he will never leave them till he hath fully satisfied their longing souls with his goodness. From bondage, terror, and the borders of despair, he brings them forth to liberty, to confidence, and comfort. He heals their diseases, restores their strength and vigour, and even removes those troubles which they have brought upon themselves by their own folly. He preserves them through the storms of temptation and persecution; he speaks peace, and commands a calm, to their souls, when they are ready to give up all for lost. Whilst they are steering to the haven where they would be, they will be praising the Lord for his goodness, celebrating his wonderful works for them, “sacrificing the sacrifices of thanksgiving, declaring his works with gladness,” and “exalting him in the congregation of his people.” At length, their souls will arrive at their expected rest; and at the appointed season, the brazen gates and iron bars of death will be burst by the power of their redeeming God. But who can describe their joy and gratitude, when “mortality shall thus be swallowed up in life!”—Let us also remember to praise our God, for turning the wilderness which we Gentiles inhabited into a fruitful land, and opening for us the wells of salvation. (Note, Is. xii. 3.) Let us pray that the Jewish nation, which has been so long a barren desert, may again be watered with his grace, and bring forth the fruits of faith and holiness. Let all the Lord’s ministers and people cultivate their fields and vineyards, their own souls, and those of their families and congregations; that, being blessed exceedingly, the church may yield more abundantly “the fruits of increase.” Let us pray for the revival of religion in those places, where the church is diminished and brought low through oppression, or corrupted with superstition and error; and that God would convert, or pour contempt upon, all those princes or people who oppose the promulgation of his pure gospel, that they may lose their labour, and be baffled in all their devices; and that he would replenish the poor in spirit and afflicted, and increase every one of his people into families, like large flocks of sheep. Then shall the righteous behold and rejoice, and iniquity shall be disgraced and repressed; and the wise observer will more and more understand and admire “the lovingkindness of the Lord.”

NOTES.

PSALM CVIII. V. 1-5. This psalm consists of the latter part of the fifty-seventh psalm, and the latter part of the sixtieth, with no material alteration. The fifty-seventh was composed when David fled from Saul in the cave; and begins with grievous complaints, which are here omitted. (Notes, lvii. Title, 1-6.) The sixtieth was written after David had for some time reigned over all Israel, and when he was engaged in war with the Syrians and others. (Notes, lx. Title, 1-4.) It also begins with complaints of the calamities to which Israel had been exposed; and these, too, are left out. So that this, as a psalm, is more in the strain of confidence, gratitude, and joyful hope, than either of those from which it is taken; and thus, more suited to a season of thanksgiving for past mercies, and prayer for further deliverance; and it is probable it was compiled for that purpose.—Even with my glory. (1.) ‘My tongue, because it chiefly setteth forth the glory of God.’ (xvi. P. O. Notes, xxx. 11, 12. Marg. Ref.)—(4.) ‘My thankfulness should be as boundless as thy mercy,

PSALM CIX.

David, as the type of Christ, complains of the slanders, deceit, and malice of his enemies, 1-5. He predicts the doom of Judas, by devoting one person, in particular, to destruction, 6-20. He complains of his sufferings, prays for relief, and determines to praise the Lord, 21-31.

V. 6—20. Whether David, when he wrote these verses, thought of Doeg; or Ahithophel, who being a traitor, more resembled Judas, as he also did in murdering himself; (Notes, 2 Sam. xvii. 23. Matt. xxvii. 3—5;) they are most certainly a prophetic denunciation of the doom which awaited the enemies of Christ, and Judas in particular: for the apostle has quoted one clause from the passage, with this remarkable introduction; "This scripture must needs have been fulfilled, which the Holy Ghost, by the mouth of David, spake concerning Judas," &c. (8. Notes, Acts i. 16—22.)—The historian gives the exact words from the Septuagint, which translates the whole as an imprecation. Indeed the first verb is the only one, which necessarily requires this construction, being literally rendered, "Set thou," &c. whereas all the other verbs are in the future, and may properly be rendered as prophecies. Yet the first verb, being imperative, with the quotation in the Acts from the Septuagint, seems to imply, that sentence was prophetically denounced against the criminal, or criminals, and not merely the event foretold. If David intended not only to predict, but to imprecate, the vengeance of God on apostate Ahithophel and his impenitent foes, as the first word seems to imply; it should be remembered, that "the Spirit of God spake by him;" taking occasion from his circumstances to predict, in this alarming manner, the miseries which would come on the enemies of the Messiah. But, unless we were under the same influence, the example is not suited for our imitation; and we ought by no means to adopt the words with reference to our own enemies: yet there can be no impropriety in reading, or singing, the psalm, as the sentence of our Judge on his implacable opposers and blasphemers, for a solemn warning to all who hear it; any more than in reading the latter part of the twenty-fifth chapter of St. Matthew, or the curses contained in the twenty-seventh, twenty-eighth, and twenty-ninth chapters of Deuteronomy. (Note, Deut. xxvii. 15.)—We may apply the whole passage to Judas, who ungratefully and basely sold Jesus to his enemies. He was left to become the servant to a most wicked and cruel master, when he hired himself to Caiaphas, as the head of the Sanhedrim, who treated his remorse of conscience with such contempt, as helped to hurry him into desperation: his tempter "Satan stood at his right hand" as his accuser, and urged him to suicide: he hath ever since been considered as a guilty wretch by almost every body: he was expressly condemned by the Lord Jesus himself; (Note, Matt. xxii. 22—24;) his prayers were mere form and hypocrisy, and not the language of true repentance and faith, so that they aggravated his guilt: his days were few, and another was chosen to succeed to his apostleship. (Note, Acts i. 20—26.) Probably, he left a widow and fatherless children, on whom infamy and distress were entailed, in the righteous providence of God, till the family was extinct; and thus the sins of his progenitors were visited upon him and his descendants, in a remarkable manner. By betraying Christ, he refused his blessing, and avowed that he would not follow him in doing good; and preferred a curse and mischief; and he, as it were, clothed himself with malevolence and treachery: the blessing of God would therefore be removed far from him; and his curse would cover and cleave to him as a garment, confine him as a girdle, enter into his bowels as water, and insinuate into his bones as oil; that is, it would be his only and his everlasting portion. The verses may also be applied to the Jewish nation; who, having rejected and crucified Christ, were given up to be tyrannized over by one usurper after another, and to be infatuated by Satan in an unheard-of manner. Under the Divine condemnation, for their obstinate unbelief, their hypocritical religion only added to their guilt, by rendering them more proud, bigoted, and furious in persecuting the Christians. Their civil and ecclesiastical state expired within forty years from the death of Christ, and their peculiar privileges were transferred to the Gentile converts. At the destruction of Jerusalem, immense multitudes were slain; their widows and orphans were left to penury and misery; and their posterity have ever since been dispersed as vagabonds, and preyed upon by extortion and oppression, in almost every land: their name hath been, as it were, expunged from the records of the church; all the iniquities of the nation, from its origin, were visited on that and the succeeding generations; and the horrible imprecation, which the enraged persecutors of Christ uttered against themselves and their children, has been as awfully fulfilled. (Notes, Deut. xxviii. 15—68. xxix. 18—28. Matt. xxvii. 24, 25. 1 Thes. ii. 13—16.)—The whole may also be applied to all the enemies of Christ and his church, in every age and nation. (Marg. V. 21. O God the Lord. Or, JEHOVAH my Lord.—According to thy name. As thou art named merciful, and gracious, and longsuffering; so shew thyself in effect. (Note, Ex. xxxiv. 5—7.)

V. 22—24. (16.) David, when driven from his palace and city, and out of Judah, and when compelled to depend on a few loyal subjects for sustenance, was at least as poor, as during his persecutions by Saul: and his heart was far more deeply "wounded within him," both in contrition and self-abasement, and by anguish of spirit. (Notes, 2 Sam. xv. 24—30. xvi. 1—15. xvii. 27—29.) Being advanced in years, he considered himself, as "a shadow that declineth," towards the sun-set; and not having a settled home, but wandering from place to place, according to the tidings brought him of the conspirators; he resembled the locust, which is driven by the wind to east or west, without being able to keep any settled course. (Notes, Ex. x. 12—19. Joel ii. 18—20.) And besides fasting, in humbling himself before God, and through sorrow of heart, he wanted often suitable provision; and thus he grew feeble and emaciated.—But the poverty and sorrow of the Saviour, "who had not where to lay his head," and all the events of his life, especially from his fasting in the wilderness, to the close of his sufferings on the cross, are most emphatically described. (Marg. Ref. Note, 2 Cor. viii. 6—9.)

V. 25. "I was also a reproach to them! They looked on me! they shook their heads." (Marg. Ref. Notes, xxii. 7, 8. xxxi. 10—13. xxxv. 15, 16. Matt. xxvii. 39—44.)

V. 26, 27. When God restored David to the throne in peace and honour, his hand was manifest in the surprising change, and his enemies were appalled and silenced: and when Christ was raised from the grave, and exalted to the

PSALM CX.

A prophecy of the Messiah's kingdom, subjects, priesthood, triumphs, and sufferings, as connecting them, 1-7.

A Psalm of David.

THE LORD said unto my Lord, "Sit thou at my right hand, until I make thine enemies thy footstool." 2 The LORD shall send "the rod of thy strength out of Zion: rule thou in the midst of thine enemies." 3 "Thy people shall be willing in the day of thy power, in the beauties of holiness, from the womb of the morning: thou hast the dew of thy youth."

right hand of the majesty in the heavens, the power of God was displayed to the conviction of millions, in that and future ages, that the whole was his work. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 28-30. "They will curse, but thou wilt bless. They shall be ashamed; but thy servant shall rejoice. Mine adversaries shall be clothed with shame. They shall cover themselves with their own confusion as with a mantle. I will greatly, &c. The whole is future in the original: and the language of assured faith and hope, or of perfect foreknowledge, in the depth of distress, is more suited to the case, both of the type and antitype, as well as more animated, than that of supplication. (Notes, Ps. xxii. 22-24. xl. 14-16. lxxix. 29-32. Marg. Ref.)

V. 31. (Notes, cx. 5, 6. Prov. xxii. 22-23. 2 Tim. iv. 16-18.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Our incarnate Redeemer willingly became poor, and submitted to pain and suffering, for our sakes, to atone for our sins, and effect our salvation: and when we consider, that the gifts which his hands bestow, were purchased by "his heart being wounded within him," by his "being wasted as a shadow, and driven about as a leucist" in the wind; and by "his knees being weak with fastings;" we should place the higher value on them, and express the more gratitude to him.—These wicked men, who spread slanders, and uttered blasphemies against him; who "compassed him about with words of hatred, and fought against him without a cause;" who were his adversaries because of his love to sinners, and rewarded him evil for good; did indeed fulfil the predictions of the Scriptures and the divine decrees: but as they were actuated by the most diabolical enmity to God and holiness, they exposed themselves to the most awful vengeance. (Notes, Acts ii. 22-24. iv. 23-28.) If then we in any measure bear the image and seek the honour of Christ, we must expect to be hated by persons of the same character, and must stand prepared to bear their malice, slanders, treachery, injustice, and ingratitude, with firmness, patience, and meekness; "considering him who endured the contradiction of sinners against himself," and "giving ourselves unto prayer." And if we duly estimate our obligations to the Redeemer, we shall not be reluctant to suffer for his sake, and according to his will; whether he be pleased to prove us by poverty, sickness, persecution, or self-denying labours.—In all our trials we should call upon the Lord, as "the God of our praise," in whom we glory, and whom we delight to worship; we should beg of him to deliver us "for his own name's sake," and according to his abundant mercy; and that his hand may appear and be glorified.—We need not regard the malicious imprecations of ungodly men: though they curse, he will bless those who trust in him, and they will rejoice when their enemies will be covered with confusion: for God will plead the cause of those who honour him by their animated praises; he will rebuke Satan, and every accuser, and "save them from those who would condemn their souls."—We must persevere in "blessing those who curse us," and in endeavouring to "overcome evil with good." Yet in the case of Judas and the unbelieving Jews, the enemies of Christ and his people may read their own doom, if they continue impenitent. No language can express the miseries which are coming upon them, where there will be no remedy, no help, no mercy; for what are all the temporal afflictions which can befall us, or our descendants, compared with the everlasting wrath of God? Indeed enmity against Christ is likely to entail infamy and misery upon a man's family through successive generations: and they who shew no mercy to the poor, especially to his needy and broken-hearted people, but treat them with insult and cruelty, must expect no mercy from God. Nay, when men reject the salvation of Christ, their very prayers are numbered among their sins. Satan will be permitted to tempt, to tyrannize over, to accuse, and to torment them, and their condemnation and ruin will be inevitable and sudden. In rejecting Christ, they refuse "the blessing, and it will be far from them;" the curse of the broken law is eventually their choice and their portion; all the blasphemous expressions which they employ against the truths and professors of the gospel, and all the imprecations which they liberally bestow on those who offend or differ from them, will rebound upon themselves, and enhance their condemnation and misery. This will be the reward of all the adversaries of Christ, and of all who revile and hate his people. Let sinners then take warning, and flee for refuge to the great Redeemer; let those, who have employed their tongues in cursing and profaneness, fear and tremble, lest their multiplied imprecations should come upon themselves: let all opposers of the gospel be persuaded to cease from their ruinous attempts; and let all the Lord's poor and afflicted people rejoice in him, and praise his holy name.

NOTES.

PSALM CX. V. 1. "David speaks of some person, much greater than himself, whom he calls his Lord; so that it can be no other but the LORD CHRIST, of whom he here prophesies: not, as he is wont to do elsewhere, with respect to himself, in the first place, as his type and figure, but in plain words, which can belong to none but Christ alone: for no other king can be said to sit at God's right hand; nor was there any priest after the order of Melchizedek, that could be a type of him.—The Jews have taken a deal of pains to wrest this psalm to another sense: yet they are so divided in their opinions about it, (speaking inconsistent things, like drunken men, as St. Chrysostom's words are, or rather, says he, like men in the dark, running against one another,) that from thence alone we may be satisfied they are in the wrong, and have their eyes blinded." (Ep. Patrick.) "We are here informed of JEHOVAH's eternal and unchangeable decree, concerning the kingdom of the Messiah, its extension, power, and duration. That Messiah should, after his sufferings, be thus exalted, was determined in the Divine counsel and covenant, before the world began.—"O my Son Messiah, take now the throne prepared for thee from the foundation of the world.—Behold, all power is given to thee! Enter upon thy mediatorial kingdom, and reign till every opposer shall have submitted unto thee, and sin and death have felt thy all-conquering arm." (Ep. Horne.) This interpretation is established by multiplied quotations from the psalm, in the New Testament, with the most express application of it to the kingdom of Christ.—David, speaking by the Holy Spirit, calls the promised Messiah his Lord, though he was to descend from him, according to the flesh; not only because he should hereafter be far superior to him and all the kings of the earth, but because he then existed in glory, as the eternal Son of God. (Notes, Matt. xxii. 41-46. Mark xiii. 35-37. Luke xx. 41-44. Acts ii. 31-36. 1 Cor. xv. 22-28. Heb. x. 11-13.)

V. 2. In the former verse the royal prophet reported the words of JEHOVAH to the Messiah; but here he addresses the Messiah as present. "The eternal Lord, who hath thus decreed to honour thee, O most mighty prince, will make Zion first of all to feel how powerful thy sceptre is, and thence extend thy empire over all the earth; where, I foretell, thou wilt prevail over all infidelity, idolatry, superstition, and impiety, which will set themselves against thy authority." (Ep. Patrick.) (Notes, Rev. xx. 1-8.)—Go on, victorious prince: plant the standard of the cross among the thickest ranks of the adversary; and, in opposition to both Jew and Gentile, tumultuously raging against thee, erect and establish thy church throughout the world." (Ep. Horne.) The gospel, "preached with the Holy Ghost sent down from heaven," is "the rod," or sceptre, of the Redeemer's strength, or authority. This was sent forth from Zion by the apostles and evangelists, who were the instruments of setting up his kingdom; (Notes, Is. ii. 2-5. Ez. xlvii. 1-10. Luke xxiv. 44-49;) by which he hath ever since reigned over an innumerable multitude of subjects, in the midst of the most furious and inveterate enemies; namely, evil spirits and wicked men, who in vain attempt to subvert his throne, or deprive him of his subjects. (Notes, Matt. xvi. 18. John x. 26-31. Rom. viii. 33-39.)

V. 3. "The people" of Christ are those given him by his Father, and gathered to him by the preachers of his word. "The day of his power," is the season of their conversion, when the corruptions of nature can no longer hold out against the prevailing influences of grace; when the heart, and will, and affections turn from the world to God, and they make, as the first disciples did, a free and voluntary offering of themselves, and all they have, to the Redeemer. Then, they appear "in the beauties of holiness," adorned with humility, faith, hope, and love, and all the graces of the Spirit." (Ep. Horne.)—"More than the dew from the womb of the morning, is the dew of thy progeny."—Thus some translate the last clause; but perhaps the word rendered "thy youth" refers to the first publication of the gospel, the early days of the glorified Redeemer's kingdom; when converts, numerous as the drops of dew, which, by a bold metaphor, are said to be produced "from the womb of the morning," "gladly received the word," willingly yielded themselves to the Lord Jesus. The word rendered "willing," is literally voluntary offerings: it seems to imply, the most unreserved cheerfulness, in presenting the oblation: like that which David expresses. (Note, 1 Chr. xxix. 10-19.) The scene exhibited on the day of Pentecost, and just afterwards, when the haughty and selfish crucifiers of Christ, in that "day of his power," not only were made willing by divine grace to accept his salvation; but without the least reluctance, devoted their all, as a free-will offering to his service. (Notes, Acts ii. 37-47. iv. 32-37. 2 Cor. viii. 1-5.)

V. 4. "The oath of God was the great seal of heaven, to intimate the importance of the deed to which it was set, and "to shew the heirs of promise, the immutability of his counsel." Oblation, intercession, and benediction are the three branches of the sacerdotal office, which our great High Priest exerciseth for us." (Ep. Horne.)—The Redeemer's kingdom is inseparably connected with the performances of his priestly office; to which he was appointed by an irrevocable engagement of the Father, and in which he abides from age to age. In virtue of his atonement and intercession, he employs all his power and authority for the benefit of his redeemed people. But it should be carefully noted, that the two offices, of king and priest, were incompatible, according to the Mosaic law, at least after the appointment of David and his family to the kingdom: and the Jews must have known, if they had not been blinded

NOTES.

PSALM CXII. V. 1. This psalm is composed in the same manner as the foregoing; and, it should be remarked, that the Septuagint places the word "Hallelujah" as the title to this and similar psalms.—"It seems intended as a short commentary upon the last verse of the preceding psalm."—The wise man is happy; "the fear of the LORD is the beginning of wisdom." Where the true fear of God possesses the heart, the happy man will love God's commandments, greatly delight in obeying them, and only grieve that he "cannot do the things that he would." (Notes, i. 1-3. cxix. 1-5. John iv. 31-38. Rom. vii. 22-25. 1 John v. 1-3.)

V. 2, 3. It is probable that Lot thought of enriching his family, when he chose the fertile plains of wicked Sodom: "but Abraham" feared the LORD, and delighted greatly "in his commandments;" and his descendants were "mighty on earth;" and thus it will generally be, in every age, with the posterity of those who imitate the father of the faithful. (Notes, xxxvii. 25, 26. Prov. iii. 16. xv. 6. xx. 7. Matt. vi. 33, 34. 1 Cor. iii. 18-23. 2 Cor. vi. 3-10. 1 Tim. iv. 6-10. vi. 6-10.—cxl. 9, 10. Prov. xii. 3. Is. li. 4-8. Rom. v. 1, 2. viii. 33-39.)

V. 4. The upright believer is a follower, or imitator, of his God, especially in kindness, and compassion, and equity. (Marg. Ref.) He may, and will, have distress or affliction; but light, or comfort, will arise in the midst of it. (Notes, xxxiv. 15-19. xxxvii. 27-38. xcvii. 11. Rom. v. 3-5.)

V. 5. (Marg. Ref.) 'He gives to one, and lends to another, as occasion serves; and yet orders all his affairs so judiciously, that he doth not impair, but rather maintain, the good estate of his family.' (Bp. Patriek.)—This sentiment, which our translation establishes, is very beautiful and scriptural; yet the original words do not obviously convey it, but rather, that the upright man conducts all his concerns with "judgment," or equity. He is first just, then liberal. Each of the interpretations conveys its appropriate instruction. 'He who employeth his talents for the good of mankind, will be able to render a good account to his Lord who intrusteth them with him.' (Bp. Horne.)—Lendeth. (Notes, Deut. xv. 9. Prov. vi. 1-5. Luke vi. 27-38.)

V. 6. The man of whom the psalmist spake, possessed the "things which accompany salvation," and would therefore most surely be "kept by the power of God through faith," to the eternal enjoyment of it. (Notes, Heb. vi. 9, 10. 1 Pet. i. 3-5.) 'When his work is done, his body will go to its repose in the dust, but the memorial of his name and good deeds will be still fresh as the morning breeze, and fragrant as the flower.' (Bp. Horne.) (Notes, x. 7. Matt. xxvi. 6-13. 2 Pet. ii. 5-11. Marg. Ref.)—It is, however, in heaven alone, that all persons of this character will be remembered, and that for ever.

V. 7. Dismaying fear of outward calamities, or even of death and judgment, arises, either from entire unbelief, or from weakness of faith, and want of assured hope; and these are frequently the effect of a comparatively negligent and unfruitful conduct; but the character here described is strong in faith and hope, and very diligent and fruitful; and thus exempted from those terrors which distress others. (Notes, xi. 1-5. xxvii. 1-3. lvi. 3, 4. Prov. xviii. 10, 11. xxvii. 1. Is. xxvi. 3, 4. Matt. viii. 23-27.)

V. 8. Desire. (Note, xcii. 11.)

V. 9. (Notes, Prov. xi. 24, 25. Ec. xi. 1-6. Is. lviii. 5-12. 2 Cor. viii. 8-11. Marg. Ref.)

V. 10. The word rendered "grieved," is literally enraged; and it may be easily conceived, how persecutors, especially, will be filled with rage and madness, when they witness the final triumph, and exalted honour, and complete felicity, of the very persons whom they most implacably hate, connected with the entire and final disappointment of all their hopes, and the blackness of misery and despair. (Marg. Ref. Note, Matt. viii. 10-12.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The blessed Redeemer so delighted in the commandments of the Lord, that it was his meat to obey them perfectly, in the midst of temptation and sufferings. His true disciples, whom he owns as brethren, share his unsearchable to tremble at his power, so his people ought to "serve him with reverence and godly fear." And, indeed, this "fear of the LORD is the beginning," or principal part, of true wisdom, and makes way for the attainment of all the rest. (Notes, cxii. 1. Gen. xxii. 12. Job xxviii. 28. Prov. i. 7. Ec. xii. 11-14.) 'Religion is the perfection of wisdom, practice the best instructor, and thanksgiving the sweetest recreation.' (Bp. Horne.)—"A good understanding is to them who practise these things." "His praise endureth for ever."—They who do these things will praise God for ever; or they will be honoured for ever. (Marg. Ref.)—Reverend. (9.) The same word is often rendered terrible, (xlvii. 2. lxxi. 3. 5. Neh. i. 5.) One, whom all have cause to fear and reverence with holy awe.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Our exhortations should always be seconded by our example, if we would render them effectual.—In worshipping God, we should be careful to approve our hearts sincere before him, and to have our affections lively. We should also be avowed in our grateful praises, and present them in the select companies of upright believers, and in the great congregations which assemble for public worship; for this has a powerful tendency to make known his glory, and to animate and edify his people.—At the first glance, we perceive a majesty and greatness in all the works of God; and there is nothing mean or trivial to be any where discovered in them. If we have any taste for sublimity, grandeur, and beauty, we shall take peculiar pleasure in investigating the works of creation and providence; and in admiring the discoveries which are made of the Divine wisdom, power, and goodness, in every one of them, the minute as well as the immense. But without a relish for the spiritual excellency of true holiness, we shall find no satisfaction in looking into the greatest and most wonderful of all the works of God. Nor shall we deduce profitable conclusions from any of our investigations, or learn from them to love, trust, and serve the Lord, with joy and gratitude; and then, how incapable must we be of the employment and happiness of heaven! Indeed, the administration of his universal kingdom is honourable; "the ministration of condemnation is glorious, but the ministration of righteousness exceeds in glory." (Note, 2 Cor. iii. 7-11.) This is the fullest display of all his harmonious attributes, which JEHOVAH hath ever made; his everlasting righteousness here shines forth, connected with the exercise of boundless mercy; and being "gracious, and full of compassion," he hath here "made his wonderful works to be had in remembrance." (Notes, lxxxv. 10-12. Luke i. 10-14. Eph. ii. 4-10. iii. 9-12. 1 Pet. i. 10-12.) As the Israelites subsisted on the manna, so the great Redeemer has given his flesh for the life of the world; and whilst he sustains our souls in so wonderful a manner, he will not starve our bodies, or our families.—If the Lord, "being mindful of his covenant with Abraham," "shewed his people the power of his works, that he might give them the heritage of the heathen;" he will shew his true people, who are interested in the covenant of grace, greater things, that he may put them in possession of their heavenly inheritance. The works of his hands are all wrought in performance of his promises, or in executing his threatenings, "and are done in verity and judgment." As his holy law is established on an immutable basis, so all his commandments, issued forth for the salvation of his people, are sure, and stand fast for ever, being "done in truth and uprightness." Having sent his people a redemption of a nobler nature than that of Israel out of Egypt, he hath ratified his covenant with them for ever, by his irrevocable word. His name is holy and terrible; and as sinners tremble before him, so saints should stand in awe of his infinite majesty. The fear of him is "the beginning of wisdom." No man is wise who doth not fear the Lord, and no man acts wisely except as he is influenced by that fear; this will always lead us to repentance, to faith in Christ, and to watchful and conscientious obedience. They who act in this manner, are of a good understanding, however poor, unlearned, or despised they may be in the world; and as God will be praised and glorified in and by them for ever, so will they be honoured of him, and commended for their wisdom by their fellow-servants, for ever and ever.

PSALM CXIV.

The powerful presence of God with Israel, when he brought them out of Egypt, and led them through the wilderness into Canaan, admired and adored, in exalted strains, 1—8.

WHEN "Israel went out of Egypt, the house of Jacob from "a people of strange language;

2 "Judah was his sanctuary, and Israel his dominion.

3 The "sea saw it, and fled; "Jordan was driven back.

4 The "mountains skipped like rams, and the little hills like lambs.

5 "What ailed thee, O thou sea, that thou fleddest? thou Jordan, that thou wast driven back?

6 Ye mountains, that ye skipped like rams; and ye little hills, like lambs?

7 "Tremble, thou earth, at the presence of the LORD, at the presence of the God of Jacob;

8 Which "turned the rock into a standing water, the flint into a fountain of waters.

riches, and his everlasting righteousness; and, being blessed in him, according to the degree of their faith and grace, they bear his image, and tread in his steps. They are taught to fear the Lord, as well as to love and praise him; and they delight greatly in the law of God, though not able perfectly to obey it. Blessings are laid up for them and their posterity, and as much of this world's possessions as can be profitable to them. In their darkest hours, the light of hope and peace springs up within them, and seasonable relief turns their mourning into joy. From their Lord's example, they learn to be "gracious, and full of compassion," as well as just in all their dealings; they shew favour, and give or lend to the poor and needy, as occasion requires, and ability is afforded; and they are instructed to employ frugality and discretion in their affairs, as means of being enabled to liberality. But as they should not dissipate their substance in needless expense, nor bury their talent in a napkin, so they ought not to give it away at random; but to dispense their bounty, (as the husbandman does his seed,) in that measure and manner, which is likely to produce the most good to mankind. But, alas! it must be owned, that only some—nay, but few of those who contend zealously for the doctrines of the gospel, exhibit such a character as is here drawn; especially in imitating the Saviour's compassionate, self-denying, liberal love; and it is worthy of inquiry, whether the fears, and doubts, and complaints, of which we hear more, than of "the voice of joy and praise," and the language of unshaken confidence in God amidst dangers and alarms, do not arise from this source. The Lord deals with such persons as they do with the poor; he metes to them their own measure; and no wonder they have but little comfort, who do so little to make their brethren comfortable; and but little confidence, who are so deficient in the scriptural evidences of conversion. But they who shew their faith by their works, in the way and degree here described, most certainly have a "righteousness which endureth for ever," and they shall never be separated from the love of God their Saviour. Envy and detraction may for a time hide their true characters; but "they shall be had in everlasting remembrance." They need not, and ought not, to be "afraid of evil tidings;" and by stedfastly trusting in the Lord, they rise above terror, when they hear of wars, pestilences, earthquakes, or famines; and even at the approach of death, and in the day of judgment, they shall have confidence. Then they will behold their enemies confounded and condemned; the fruits and evidences of their faith and love will be produced before men and angels, and their horn shall be exalted with eternal honour. (Notes, Matt. xxv. 31—40.) But their felicity will increase the torment of the wicked, who shall "gnash with their teeth, and consume away; whilst all their desires and expectations shall close in eternal disappointment and despair. Lord, form us by thy grace to the character, that we may possess the felicity of thy redeemed people!

NOTES.

PSALM CXIII. V. 1. We are informed by the Jewish writers, that this psalm and the five following, were sung at their feasts, especially after the celebration of the passover. (Note, Matt. xxvi. 30—35.)—'By this often repetition, he stirreth up our cold dulness to praise God.' (Marg. Ref.)

V. 2, 3. 'If God's glory shine through all the world, and therefore all ought to be praised; what great condemnation were it to his people, among whom it chiefly shineth, if they should not earnestly extol his name!' (Marg. Ref.)—It may be considered as a prophecy of the final prevalence of true religion; when all nations shall unite in the high praises of JEHOVAH, as God our Saviour. (Note, lxxii. 17—19.)

V. 4—6. (Notes, lxxxix. 6—12. xcvi. 8, 9. Ez. xv. 11. Is. xl. 18—26. lvii. 16, 17. Jer. x. 6—8. Mic. vii. 18—20.)

V. 7, 8. The advancement of Joseph, David, and others, from a low condition to the highest authority, seems alluded to; as illustrating the providential dispensations of God, and the methods of his grace. (Notes, lxxviii. 70—72. cv. 17—22. 1 Sam. ii. 2—10. Ez. xvii. 22—24. Luke i. 46—55. Rev. v. 8—10.)

V. 9. This verse may be thus rendered, perhaps more literally, "He maketh her who was barren in the family, to sit as a joyful mother of sons." The instances of Sarah, Rebekah, Rachel, the mother of Samson, Hannah, the woman of Shunem, and Elizabeth, who were long barren, but were at length made joyful mothers, by the special blessing of God, are supposed to have been emblems of the calling of the Gentiles: when that vast proportion of the earth, which had so long been barren, produced multitudes of true converts, the sons and daughters of the church, and of the Lord Almighty who hath espoused her unto himself. (Marg. Ref. Notes, Is. liv. 1—5. Gal. iv. 21—31.)—The psalm begins and ends with "Hallelujah."

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The redeemed servants of the Lord may well sing his praises, when employed in his pleasant service, and enjoying the comfort of his presence and favour. His name shall be blessed from age to age, to the end of time and to eternity: and he will be praised, from the rising of the sun to the going down of the same. His unequalled and infinite majesty becomes the more glorious by his unspeakable condescension. (Notes, xi. 4, 5. cxxxviii. 6. 2 Cor. xiii. 6—9. Phil. ii. 5—11.) He is not only high above all nations, but his glory is above the very heavens in which he dwelleth. He humbleth himself in noticing the concerns, and in accepting the exalted adorations, of angels and archangels: How vast then must be his condescension, in attending to the interests, and in regarding the worship, of us mean polluted sinners on earth! How inconceivable his love in assuming our nature, and tabernacling among us, that he might ransom our guilty souls!—In his providence, the Lord sometimes raises men from the most abject to the most honourable stations in society; and it is well when they acquit themselves properly in their new dignities. But this is his constant method in his kingdom of grace. He takes us beggars, debtors, nay, rebels and traitors, from the dust, the dunghill, or the dungeon, to be his favourites, and his children; to be kings and priests unto him; and thus he numbers us with the princes of his chosen people. He giveth us all our comforts; which are generally the more welcome, when they have been long delayed, and were no longer expected. Nor should the hint be overlooked, that joyful mothers should cheerfully bear the confinement of tending on their beloved children.—But whilst we bless the Lord, for favouring the Gentile world with the joy of his salvation; let us pray, that those lands, which are yet barren, may, by the genial influence of his gospel, become fruitful, and produce numerous converts, who may join with us in praising the Lord for ever. (Notes, lxxvi. 6, 7.)

NOTES.

PSALM CXIV. V. 1, 2. When God brought Israel out of Egypt, he manifested his presence among them, as "his sanctuary" in which he had chosen to reside; and he exercised "dominion" over them, in the most open and explicit manner, giving laws, inflicting punishments on the refractory, and protecting his loyal subjects against all enemies. (Marg. Ref. Note, John xx. 11—17.)—Strange language. (1.) (Note, lxxxi. 1—5.) The word occurs in no other place in Scripture: but the modern Jews use it.

V. 3—8. Few passages can any where be found, and probably none except in the oracles of God, which unite so much sublimity and simplicity, as these verses do. They are inexpressibly beautiful, and in the highest style of poetry; and need attention, more than explanation. The fifth verse is literally—'What to thee, O sea, that thou fleddest?' &c. (Notes, xxix. 3—11. lxxvii. 14—20. xcvi. 11—13. Is. lv. 12, 13. Nah. i. 2—6. Hab. iii. 8—10. Heb. xii. 18—21. Rev. vi. 12—17. xx. 11—15.) The deliverance of Israel, and the visible effects of omnipotence attending it, may be considered as a figure of the establishment of Christianity, and the fall of opposing powers before it; for which no adequate cause can be assigned, except "that it was of God, and men could not overturn it." (Marg. Ref. Note, Ez. xvii. 5, 6. Is. xliii. 14—21.) 'The composition of this short psalm is extremely beautiful. It commences with the simplicity of plain narration, (1.) but rises prodigiously as it proceeds. The inspired poet, describing the scene, is at once transported to the spot, sees what he relates, and demands the cause; (5.) when, suddenly overawed himself by the sense of the present Deity, he joins in calling upon the whole earth to tremble at the presence of the God of Jacob.' (7.)

PSALM CXV.

The psalmist calls on God to vindicate his own honour against the reproaches of idolaters, 1-3. He exposes the vanity of idols and the folly of idolaters, 4-8. He exhorts Israel to trust the Lord, who will not fail to bless his church, 9-18.

NOT unto us, O LORD, not unto us, but unto thy name give glory, for thy mercy, and for thy truth's sake.

2 Wherefore should the heathen say, Where is now their God?

3 But our God is in the heavens: he hath done whatsoever he hath pleased.

4 Their idols are silver and gold, the work of men's hands.

5 They have mouths, but they speak not: eyes have they, but they see not:

6 They have ears, but they hear not: noses have they, but they smell not:

7 They have hands, but they handle not: feet have they, but they walk not: neither speak they through their throat.

8 They that make them are like unto them; so is every one that trusteth in them.

9 O Israel, trust thou in the LORD: he is their help and their shield.

10 O house of Aaron, trust in the LORD: he is their help and their shield.

11 Ye that fear the LORD, trust in the LORD: he is their help and their shield.

12 The LORD hath been mindful of us: he will bless us: he will bless the house of Israel; he will bless the house of Aaron.

13 He will bless them that fear the LORD, both small and great.

14 The LORD shall increase you more and more, you and your children.

15 Ye are blessed of the LORD, which made heaven and earth.

16 The heaven, even the heavens, are the LORD's; but the earth hath he given to the children of men.

17 The dead praise not the LORD, neither any that go down into silence.

18 But we will bless the LORD from this time forth and for evermore. Praise the LORD.

V. 14-18. The increase of the church, by the conversion of the Gentiles, as well as the prosperity of Israel, is here predicted. (Marg. Ref.)—There is a peculiar animation in the concluding part of the psalm, when considered not so much as praise for benefits received, as the language of faith and hope in urgent difficulties. (Notes, vi. 5. xxx. 9, 10. Is. xxxviii. 17-20.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

We have so entirely forfeited all claim to the favour of God, and so evidently deserved his wrath; that, if blessings be conferred on us, the whole honour of them must be rendered to the Lord, who hath glorified all his perfections, and especially his "mercy and truth," in the salvation of his people; in pardoning, sanctifying, upholding, and comforting them from day to day; and in supplying all their wants, both temporal and spiritual. In like manner, when conscious unworthiness is ready to extinguish our hopes, we have a never-failing plea, in the same important truths; and we may intreat the Lord to save and bless us, for the glory of his mercy and truth, in Jesus Christ, when all our other arguments are silenced. For it can never consist with his honour, that his avowed enemies should finally triumph over those, who profess his truth and call upon his name; and thus be emboldened in impiety and infidelity.—Our God is upon his glorious throne, and "doeth as he pleaseth in the armies of heaven, and among the inhabitants of the earth;" and the temporary success of his enemies, and troubles of his people, will assuredly end in the greater good of the latter, and the deeper confusion of the former.—Whilst we reflect upon the stupidity of idolaters, with indignation and contempt; let us humbly recollect, that we are the same by nature, and remember to give God the glory of making us to differ.—They, who reject the gospel, to rely for salvation on themselves; and they who idolize worldly advantages, which cannot profit them in the hour of death, or in the day of judgment, are as fatally deceived as even the worshippers of idols.—But we are called Christians, and some of us sustain the office of ministers, (being the spiritual Israel, and the house of Aaron;) let us then remember to act consistently with our character and profession: let us not "lean to our own understanding," depend on our own righteousness and strength, trust in our own hearts, or rely on uncertain riches, and the friendship of the world; but let us trust in the Lord alone, for acceptance, assistance, sustenance, protection, comfort, usefulness, and everlasting happiness. "He hath ever been mindful of his servants, and will bless them; even every one of them, who fear him, both small and great." He will increase the number of his true ministers and people, and prosper them and their children; for they are indeed "the blessed of the Lord, who made heaven and earth." The heaven, which belongs to him, he reserves as the peculiar inheritance of his children; the earth he hath given indiscriminately to the children of men: and wretched will they be, who have no better portion; for indeed they are but stewards, who will shortly be called to give an account of their stewardship. (Notes, Luke xvi. 1-8. 19-31.) But grace is our own, and will never be taken from us. As to the rest, a little will bear the expenses of our pilgrimage; let us then be content, and thankful for our allowance, and moderate in the use of it. Let us communicate of our little to those that have less; and, if any have much intrusted to them, let them prove their interest in the true riches, by faithfully improving "the mammon of unrighteousness." (Note, Luke xvi. 9-13.) As death will terminate our opportunities of praising God on earth, let us now redeem the time, that we may glorify him with our lips, and in our lives. Then we shall shortly join the company before the throne, and assist them in blessing our God; and our bodies will be raised from the silent grave, to join in this delightful work to all eternity; whilst successive generations shall be occupied on earth, in celebrating the praises of our God, till time shall be no more. "Hallelujah, praise the Lord."

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

When the Lord comes for the salvation of his chosen people, he redeems them from the power of sin and Satan, and separates them from an ungodly world, and its maxims, customs, and language: he forms them to be his temple, and he becomes their King. From that time he has engaged to make them his peculiar care; he meets them in his ordinances; and causes the whole course of nature, and all the dispensations of his providence, to concur in doing them good. Having, as it were, divided the Red sea, to bring them out of bondage, at their conversion; he will surely divide Jordan, to open them a safe passage to their heavenly inheritance. All things, even death itself, are their's; and all nature shall sooner change its settled course, than one of his promises shall fail.—As the Son of God, the rock of ages, gave himself to death, to open a fountain to wash away their sins, and to supply them with the waters of life and consolation; whilst they are washing in that fountain and drinking of those waters, they cannot possibly think any thing too great to expect from his unfathomable love. But, if the inanimate creation is represented as trembling at the presence of the Creator, how should sinners fear before their just and holy Governor and Judge! His voice from mount Sinai may well alarm those, who have broken that holy law, and yet remain under the curse of it: and they who neglect the great salvation of the gospel, are liable to another and more terrible condemnation: but none will be so dreadfully punished, as they will, who injure the Lord's chosen people, and try to obstruct them in their pilgrimage. What will be their consternation, when the Judge shall appear, and all the creation shall melt, or vanish, at his presence! Let us now prepare to meet our God, that we may not be terrified, or "ashamed, but have confidence before him, at his coming."

NOTES.

PSALM CXV. V. 1, 2. 'The faithful, oppressed by idolatrous tyrants, desire God to help them.—Because he promised to deliver them, not for their sakes, but his own; they ground their prayers upon this promise.'—The verses are evidently a prayer for deliverance; though often quoted as a thanksgiving for benefits received; and they may properly be thus applied. God was intreated to help his people; not because they deserved it, or that they might be honoured; but that his name might be glorified, and the blasphemies of his enemies silenced, by the performance of his faithful and merciful engagements to his worshippers. (Notes, lxix. 10, 11. 21, 22. lxxxix. 8-13. Deut. xxxii. 26, 27. 1 Kings xix. 16-19. Joel ii. 15-17.) Perhaps the psalm was written during Sennacherib's invasion of Judah.

V. 3-7. (Notes, ii. 4-6. Is. xlvii. 10, 11. Dan. iv. 35-37. Matt. vi. 9. Eph. i. 9-12.) 'A beautiful contrast is here formed between the God of Israel, and the heathen idols. He made every thing; they are themselves made by men. He doeth whatsoever he pleaseth; they can do nothing. He seeth the distresses, heareth the prayers, accepteth the offerings, cometh to the assistance, and effecteth the salvation of his servants; they are blind, deaf, dumb, senseless, motionless, and impotent.' (Bp. Horne). (Marg. Ref.)

V. 8. The makers and worshippers of idols renounce their reason and understanding, and willingly become as stupid as the very objects of their worship: "Having eyes they see not, having ears they hear not," &c. (Notes, Is. xlv. 9-20. xlv. 20-22. xlv. 5-9. Jer. x. 3-16. Hab. ii. 1, 2.)

V. 9-13. The Israelites in general, and the priests in particular, (who were required to teach the people by example, as well as precept,) were exhorted to trust in the Lord; reminded how he had, in all ages, shewn himself the helper of such as thus relied on him; and assured that he would bless them. (Notes, cxviii. 1-4. cxxxv. 15-21.) (Marg. Ref.) The proselytes, also, from other nations, seem intended by those "who fear the LORD."

PSALM CXVI.

The psalmist avows his gratitude to God, who had answered his prayers, and brought him out of deep distress; and resolves to worship and serve him all his days, 1-9. He records his temptation to unbelief, and his victory over it, 10, 11. He determines to perform his vows, and render thanks to God after the most public manner at the sanctuary, 12-19.

I LOVE the LORD, because he hath heard my voice and my supplications.

2 Because he hath inclined his ear unto me, therefore will I call upon him as long as I live.

3 The sorrows of death compassed me, and the pains of hell gat hold upon me: I found trouble and sorrow.

4 Then called I upon the name of the LORD; O LORD, I beseech thee, deliver my soul.

5 Gracious is the LORD, and righteous: yea, our God is merciful.

6 The LORD preserveth the simple: I was brought low, and he helped me.

7 Return unto thy rest, O my soul; for the LORD hath dealt bountifully with thee.

8 For thou hast delivered my soul from death, mine eyes from tears, and my feet from falling.

NOTES.

PSALM CXVI. V. 1. Various are the opinions of learned men, concerning the author of this psalm, and the time when it was composed; but perhaps David wrote it; not when persecuted by Saul, (for the sanctuary was not then at Jerusalem,) but either when delivered from Absalom's rebellion, or after some other sharp trial, between the removal of the ark to Zion and that event. (Notes, xxx. 6-8. xxxviii. 1-10. xli. 1-3.)—Several instances occur, in which the Chaldee dialect (so to speak) is used; which militates against this opinion, and seems to indicate a much later period.—The original of this verse is, "I love, because the LORD hath," &c. The object of the psalmist's love and gratitude is not mentioned at first, but may be collected from what follows. The abrupt opening was expressive of a full heart. Some render the clause, "I am satisfied," or "I am well pleased;" but it seems rather more in the manner of Peter's earnest declaration, "Lord, thou knowest all things, thou knowest that I love thee." (Note, John xxi. 15-17.)

V. 2. 'In so readily granting my desires, he encourages and engages me, to the last breath of my life, to expect deliverance from him.' (Bp. Patrick.) (Notes, xl. 1-5. lv. 17, 18. Marg. Ref.)

V. 3. The inward anguish of the psalmist's mind was equal to his outward sufferings. He seemed to feel at once the agonies of death, and that sense of wrath and remorse of conscience which have in them something of the pains of hell. It is by no means natural to interpret both the expressions of the fear or pain of death; or of death, and the grave, in which no pains are felt; (Notes, xvi. 8-11;) when so obvious an interpretation offers itself, and one so suited to the feelings of every one, who, in great pain of body, and remorse of conscience, has been alarmed with the dread of immediate death. (Notes, xviii. 4, 5. xxxii. 3-5. xl. 11, 12. lxxxvi. 13. 2 Sam. xxxii. 5, 6.)

V. 4. The expressive brevity of the prayer here mentioned, is well worth noticing. (Marg. Ref. Notes, cxlii. 4-6. Luke xviii. 9-14. cxlii. 42.)

V. 5. "A just God and a Saviour;" righteous in shewing mercy to the guilty, as well as faithful to his promises. (Marg. Ref. Notes, Is. xiv. 20-22. Rom. iii. 20-26.)

V. 6. The simple are they, who feel themselves liable to be imposed on by designing foes; who are destitute of wisdom and power to deliver themselves; but who renounce all other dependence, to rely wholly on God, and "in simplicity and godly sincerity," to wait on him to save them. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 7. To know, trust, love, and delight in God is the "rest" of rational creatures. (Notes, xc. 1, 2.) This is forsaken through sin; and hence arises the restlessness of mankind; but the believer has returned to God, through the Saviour, and found, in some measure, "a rest to his soul," which is the earnest and foretaste of heavenly felicity. (Notes, xcv. 10, 11. Jer. vi. 16, 17. Matt. xi. 28-30. Heb. iv. 1-11.) Yet this is imperfect, and often interrupted, especially by sin; and, when chastenings bring the wanderer from God to a due sense of his sin and folly, conscious guilt at first often increases the agitation of his mind; till recollection of the Lord's former kindness, and the consolations which he vouchsafed, and the hope of recovering them, encourage and allure him to return by repentance, faith, and prayer; and this purpose is strengthened by every token and taste of returning peace and comfort. This seems to have been the psalmist's experience. (Notes, 1-6. xlii. 5, 6. cxix. 17. Hos. ii. 6, 7.)

V. 8, 9. Rescued by special grace from death and ruin, comforted from distressing sorrow, and recovered and upheld after grievous falls, the psalmist determined to walk, as in the sight of God "in the land of the living." (Marg. Ref.) The original word is plural, lands: so that the land of Canaan cannot exclusively be intended; but rather the psalmist meant to say, that he would walk before God, while he lived here; and expected at last to enjoy his presence in heaven, and serve him for ever and ever. (Notes, xxiii. 5, 6. xxvii. 13. lvi. 13. lxxxii. 23-28. cxlvi. 2.)

9 I will walk before the LORD in the land of the living.

10 I believed, therefore have I spoken: I was greatly afflicted:

11 I said in my haste, All men are liars.

12 What shall I render unto the LORD for all his benefits toward me?

13 I will take the cup of salvation, and call upon the name of the LORD.

14 I will pay my vows unto the LORD now in the presence of all his people.

15 Precious in the sight of the LORD is the death of his saints.

16 O LORD, truly I am thy servant; I am thy servant, and the son of thine handmaid: thou hast loosed my bonds.

17 I will offer to thee the sacrifice of thanksgiving, and will call upon the name of the LORD.

18 I will pay my vows unto the LORD now in the presence of all his people:

19 In the courts of the LORD's house, in the midst of thee, O Jerusalem. Praise ye the LORD.

V. 10, 11. "I believed, and therefore I spoke," that is, "I called on God under my distresses," in expectation of help from him alone. But "I was so discouraged and afflicted, that in the hurry of my mind, I could place no reliance on any man, but thought even those deceivers, in whom before I had the greatest confidence." Some expositors, supposing that David wrote the psalm during the life of Saul, or very soon after his death; conclude, that he referred to Samuel especially, who had anointed him to the kingdom, as if he had deceived him with vain hopes. Or, if a later date be assigned, (Note, 1,) it may be thought that he intended Nathan, by whom he had been assured that Solomon should succeed him. (Notes, 2 Sam. vii. 12-16. xii. 24, 25.) He may, however, most naturally be supposed to refer to Ahithophel's treachery, Absalom's rebellion, and the revolt of Israel; which so astonished and afflicted him, that he was ready to suspect every one about him; though the event proved, that he had many faithful zealous friends. His faith in God's mercy and truth, amidst his fears and suspicions concerning men, remained unshaken and gained the victory. (Note, 2 Cor. iv. 13-18.)—The literal rendering is, "I believed, and therefore I will speak;" but the apostle quotes the passage, from the Septuagint, as relating to the past.

V. 12. Some render this verse thus; "What shall I render unto the LORD? All his benefits overcome me!" "I am so overwhelmed with his abundant goodness, that I am lost in wonder, and know not how to express my gratitude." (Marg. Ref.)

V. 13. "I will call all my friends together, to rejoice with me; and taking the cup, which we call the cup of deliverance, (because when blessed and set apart, we are thus wont to commemorate the blessings we have received,) I will magnify the power, goodness, and faithfulness of God my Saviour before all the company; and then give it to them, that they may praise his name together with me." (Bp. Patrick.) It seems to have been customary among the Jews thus to take the cup of deliverance, when celebrating their solemn feasts, as well as when offering sacrifices of thanksgivings for peculiar mercies: and it is thought that our Saviour, complying with this custom at his last passover, thence took occasion to institute the Lord's supper; which hath ever since been to Christians "the cup of salvation," and a memorial of his immeasurable love, in giving himself to death for their sins; an outward sign of their receiving, by faith, him as their salvation; and a grateful acknowledgment of the inestimable benefits of which they partake through his atoning sacrifice. (Notes, Matt. xxvi. 26-29. Luke xxii. 14-20. 1 Cor. x. 15-17. xi. 17-34.)

V. 14. (Notes, 17-19. xxii. 25. lxxvi. 13-15. lxxxvi. 11, 12.)

V. 15. The Lord accounts the death of his saints a very important event. He will not allow their enemies to cut them off before his appointed time. The circumstances of their death are regulated by infinite wisdom and love, for their final benefit: that solemn event often proves a precious opportunity to the survivors, and tends greatly to the honour of God; and it always issues in their complete felicity. (Notes, lxxii. 14. Luke xvi. 22, 23. Acts xviii. 9-11. xxiii. 11. xxvii. 20-26.) The word rendered "saints," may either mean those who obtain mercy from God, or such as have been taught by him to shew mercy. (Note, xxx. 4.) Our Lord seems to have had it in view, when he said, "Blessed are the merciful, for they shall obtain mercy." (Note, Matt. v. 7.)

V. 16. (Note, lxxxvi. 16.) "I confess before thee, that I am thy servant," &c. Thou hast loosed my bonds." "The recent deliverance, which I have experienced, lays me under new, and stronger, obligations than ever, to serve thee, with all the power and influence which I possess, and I thus avow my purpose of so doing." (Marg. Ref.)

V. 17-19. "Calling on the name of the LORD," sometimes means, celebrating his praises, and acknowledging his mercies, as well as prayer and supplication. (Notes, 1 Chr. xvi. 8, 9. Is. xii. 4-6.) The psalmist, when calling

 2 For <sup>c</sup>his merciful kindness is great toward us: and the truth of the LORD endureth for ever. Praise ye the LORD.

PSALM CXVIII.

The psalmist exhorts all orders of men in Israel to praise God, 1-4. He shews by his own experience how good it is to trust in the Lord, 5-18. In blessing him for deliverance and advancement, and calling on the people to join in his triumphant praises, he predicts the coming and the kingdom of the Messiah, 19-29.

on God for deliverance during his distress, had solemnly vowed to make the most public acknowledgments of his goodness, when his prayer should be answered. (Notes, 13, 14. cxviii. 19-24.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1-9. We should not only be satisfied, and delighted, when "the LORD hath heard our voice and our supplications;" but should love him "on that account, as well as for his own essential excellences, and all his innumerable benefits. But we are never so greatly affected with his condescension and kindness, as when he hath relieved us out of extreme distress. The poor sinner when awakened to a sense of his state and character, recollects that he must shortly die, and fears lest he should sink under the righteous and everlasting wrath of God; then "the sorrows of death and the pains of hell get hold of him, and he finds trouble and sorrow." But let such persons, without delay, "call upon the LORD," and say, "O LORD, I beseech thee, deliver my soul:" and they will find him most gracious, and true to his promise, and will learn how his perfect justice harmonizes with his abounding mercy: for he is as ready to teach the simple, and uphold the feeble, and defend the poor, who trust in him; as he is to pardon the guilty, and sanctify the unholy: and, having raised them up from this low estate, they will learn to love him and "call upon him as long as they live." His ways are not as our's are: he pardons criminals, and relieves the indigent, that they may be encouraged to come again and again; and may learn to love prayer; because "he delights in the prayer of the upright." Let then those "who labour, and are heavy laden, come to him that they may find rest to their souls." Let believers keep close to their rest; and if they be at all drawn from it, let them make haste to return, remembering how "bountifully the LORD hath dealt with them." Having "delivered our souls from death, our eyes from tears, and our feet from falling," we should deem ourselves bound "to walk before him," and as in his presence. But when we shall enter our heavenly rest, our deliverance from sin and sorrow will be complete; our tears will be finally wiped away, and our feet will no more slip; but we shall behold the glory, and walk in the presence, of God, in the land of the living, with inconceivable delight. (Notes, Is. xxx. 6-8. Rev. vii. 13-17. xxi. 22-27.)

V. 10-19. When we are discomfited by temptations; we had in general better keep silence if possible, for we are apt to speak unadvisedly: and our conviction of man's deceitfulness may sometimes lead us, before we are aware, to impeach the Divine veracity, and to treat even those "liars," who would encourage us from the promise of God. But true faith will at length prevail in every conflict; and, being humbled for our distrust of his sacred word, we shall experience his faithfulness.—What shall the redeemed sinner, when his heart is full of joy and gratitude; or what shall any of us, who have been delivered from urgent trouble and distress, "render unto the LORD for all his benefits towards us?" We cannot in any way, profit him, or offer him any thing which he hath not first given unto us; and our best is unworthy of his acceptance: yet we ought to devote ourselves and all we have to his service and glory. (Note, 1 Chr. xxix. 10-19.)—Whilst we enjoy the comfort of his salvation in our secret communion with him; we should also make an open profession of our faith and love, and avow our dependence on him and obligations to him, by taking "the cup of salvation," and remembering the bleeding love of our divine Saviour, in that ordinance which he hath instituted for that purpose: thus joining ourselves to him and to his people, and with them calling upon his name, that we may be enabled by his grace to walk consistently with our profession. Thus every sinner, who hath found peace and deliverance through the blood of Christ, should "pay his vows in the presence of all his people." Thus every true son of the church, whose bonds have been loosed, and who is become the servant of God, should frequently offer the sacrifice of thanksgiving, as well as join in other parts of his solemn worship. (Note, xl. 1-5.) And every believer, when he hath received any recent mercy should express his gratitude, by this memorial of that precious blood-shedding which hath purchased all our mercies; and should avow his purpose, by devoting his future life to the service of the God of his salvation. Such are the true saints of God, in whose lives and deaths he will be glorified: no enemy or event can deduct from their appointed period on earth; much less shall any destroy their souls. But when the measure of their trials and services is accomplished, their God and Saviour will remove them, in the best manner, to that new Jerusalem, where they will pay their vows with all the redeemed, and offer eternal sacrifices of exalted praise and thanksgiving, "to him who loved them, and washed them from their sins in his precious blood;" and their bodies also shall at length be raised incorruptible, to join the sacred worship, and share that glorious felicity. Let us then "give diligence to make our calling and election sure;" let us trust the Lord in the path of duty; let us fear no danger, and decline no difficulty, in his service; and let us learn to consider the day of our death, as the period of our labours and conflicts, and our entrance into rest, into glory, and felicity.

NOTES.

PSALM CXVII. V. 1. 'This psalm, like the hundred and tenth, seems to be altogether prophetic of the joy that all the world would conceive, at the coming of the Messiah to give salvation, first to the Jews, and then to all other nations, according to his faithful promise.—St. Paul applies the first words of it to this business; and some of the Hebrews justify the application.' (Bp. Patrick.) (Note, Rom. xv. 8-13.)

V. 2. "For the merciful kindness of the LORD towards us hath prevailed," (or hath been confirmed,) "to us, and his truth for ever. Hallelujah." God promised to Abraham, that in Christ his seed, all nations should be blessed: he confirmed that promise, when he sent the Saviour, raised him from the dead, exalted him at his right hand, and called the Gentiles into the church: but a still more literal and extensive accomplishment of it will take place at the millennium. (Notes, xxii. 27, 28. Jer. xvi. 19-21. Dan. ii. 34, 35, 44, 45. Rev. xi. 15. xx. 1-6.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

We are the very persons, whom the Holy Spirit here addresses, and calls to join our hallelujahs with those of his ancient people: and "therefore we ought to give the more earnest heed to the things which we have heard." The very circumstance of our being the professed worshippers of the true God, by means of the gospel of Christ, that "seed of Abraham, in whom all nations shall be blessed," (Notes, Gen. xii. 1-3. xlix. 10,) is a sufficient demonstration, that the Scriptures are divinely inspired; that the mercy of God hath prevailed; and that he is ever mindful of his promise, and faithful to it even to a thousand generations.—But let us take care, that none of us "receive this gift of God in vain: let us seek the fulfilment to us, personally, of those promises which ensure the believer's eternal salvation: and, while we make it our business to glorify our God, in word and deed; let us still pray, that all the nations of the earth may "shew forth his praises, for having called them out of darkness into the marvellous light" of his blessed gospel.

NOTES.

PSALM CXVIII. V. 1-4 (Note, cxxxvi. 1. Marg. Ref.) David is thought to have composed this psalm, after his advancement to the throne, and his victories over his enemies round about: and probably it was sung by the priests, Levites, and congregation of Israel, with David at the head of them, as they marched up to the tabernacle to render public thanks for these benefits.—David, rejected of Saul and the people, in the appointed time obtained the kingdom. Under his person in all this was Christ lively set forth.—Because God by creating David king, shewed his mercy towards his afflicted church; the prophet doth not only thank God himself, but exhorteth all the people to do the same. (Notes, cxv. 9-14.)

V. 5. 'We are here taught, that the more troubles oppress us, the more ought we to be instant in prayer.'—"The LORD heard," (or answered,) "me by enlargement." When the Israelites, being straitened by the Canaanites, were enabled to drive them away and possess their inheritance; the LORD heard them, as he did Jabez; and "enlarged their coast." (Note, 1 Chr. iv. 9, 10. P. O.)—David brought out of the cave, and made king over all Israel; Christ freed from the grave, and made "head over all things to his church;" the slave of sin made free, and become the servant of God; and the believer "delivered from the bondage of corruption into the glorious liberty of the children of God," are instances illustrative of the psalmist's meaning, to which many others might be added. (Notes, xxxi. 7, 8. 2 Sam. xxii. 20.)

V. 6. "JEHOVAH for me;" or "to me," a protector. (Notes, 7. xxvii. 1-3. xli. 1-3. 7. lvi. 3, 4. Is. viii. 9-15. Rom. viii. 28-32.)

V. 7. "JEHOVAH to me, with my helpers." (Note, 6.) Though they be few, or feeble, he is almighty. (Notes, 2 Kings vi. 15-17. 2 Chr. xxxii. 7, 8.) See, &c. The Septuagint renders this very properly, "I shall look on all mine enemies." 'I shall meet them with boldness, look them in the face without fear; and witness either their submission or destruction.' (Notes, liv. 7. lix. 10. cxii. 11.)

V. 8, 9. Some render these verses, "It is better for a man to betake himself to the LORD, than to trust in men," &c. even princes.—The unfaithfulness, changeableness, weakness, and mortal nature of men, however distinguished,

10 "All nations compassed me about: but in the name of the LORD will I <sup>destroy</sup> them.

11 They <sup>compassed</sup> me about; yea, they compassed me about: but in the name of the LORD I will <sup>destroy</sup> them.

12 They compassed me about <sup>like</sup> bees; they are quenched as the fire of thorns: for <sup>in</sup> the name of the LORD I will <sup>destroy</sup> them.

13 "Thou hast thrust sore at me, that I might fall: but the LORD helped me.

14 The LORD <sup>is</sup> my strength and song, and is become my salvation.

18 The LORD hath <sup>chastened</sup> me sore: but he hath not given me over unto death.

19 <sup>Open</sup> to me the gates of righteousness; <sup>I</sup> will go in to them, and I will praise the LORD:

20 This <sup>gate</sup> of the LORD, into which the righteous shall enter.

21 I <sup>will</sup> praise thee: for thou hast heard me, and art become my salvation.

22 <sup>The</sup> stone <sup>which</sup> the builders refused, is become the head-stone of the corner.

render all reliance on them vain and insecure: and the Lord's jealousy for his own honour induces him to punish those who are guilty of this idolatrous confidence, and to encourage such as betake themselves to him in danger and distress. (Notes, lxii. 8—10. cxlvi. 3—6. Is. ii. 22. xxxi. 1—5. Jer. xvii. 5—8.)

V. 10—12. The nations bordering on Canaan confederated against David, and compassed him about, like swarms of bees, as if they would sting him to death. But, depending on the assistance of the Lord, and going forth to battle in his name, he gained repeated and decisive victories over them; so that their rage terminated, like the fire kindled among thorns; which is vehement, and makes a great blaze and noise, and consumes the thorns, and then is extinguished without much effect. (Notes, xx. 1—8. lxxxiii. 13—18. Deut. i. 44. 2 Sam. v. 17—24. viii. 1—14. x. 8. 18. xii. 5—16.) Every victory David gained, was an earnest of further success; and he trusted that, by the help of the Lord, he should be able to destroy all his enemies.—Thus the Redeemer, personally, and in his church, hath been opposed by all the nations of the earth; but destruction from the Lord is the inevitable consequence of persisting in that opposition, however numerous and formidable the opponents may appear. (Notes, ii. xxi. 8—12. xii. 16—21. xiv. 3—5. lxix. 22—28. cx. 5, 6. Rev. xix. 11—21.)

V. 13. Perhaps Saul was meant, as that enemy who had thrust sore at David that he might fall. (Marg. Ref.)—When Satan tempted Christ, and afterwards, when he prevailed to have him crucified, and assailed him with all his power in that hour of darkness: he thrust sore at the church, to destroy her at once in the person of her representative. (Notes, Gen. iii. 14, 15. Matt. iv. 1—11. P. O. xxvi. 36—39. P. O. 36—46. Luke xii. 47—53. Heb. ii. 16—18. iv. 14—16. v. 7—10.) The believer has often occasion to use the words with application to his own experience.

V. 14. "In that he was delivered, it came not of himself, or of the power of man, but only of God's favour: therefore he will praise him." (Notes, Ex. xv. 2. Is. xii. 2.)—The name JAH, used in the texts referred to, which is here exactly copied, occurs many times in this psalm. (Note, lxviii. 4.)

V. 15, 16. David's deliverance from Saul, and his exaltation to the throne, were typical of Christ's resurrection and ascension: (Note, ii. 1—6:) and on the Lord's day, when his resurrection is especially commemorated, the dwellings of true believers, all over the earth, resound with the voice of joyful and thankful praises; because "the right hand of the LORD hath done valiantly, and is exalted." (Notes, 19—24. Ex. xv. 3—6. Acts ii. 33—36.)—But rejoicing belongs to the righteous at all times: it becomes them, and them alone. (Notes, xxxiii. 1. xlvii. 11, 12. Phil. iv. 4—6.)

V. 17, 18. The triumph of David over his persecutors was an earnest of further mercies and continued protection; that he might "declare the works of the LORD." He had been sharply chastened and tried; but he "was not given over to death;" but preserved to be a highly honoured instrument of glorifying God; and promoting Israel's prosperity.—Christ, having suffered unknown agonies, when "the chastisement of our peace was upon him;" was not "given over unto death," but rose from the dead, and said to his servant John, "I am He, that liveth and was dead; and behold I am alive for evermore; and have the keys of death and of hell." (Notes, xxii. 22. 24. Is. liii. 4—6. 9—12. Acts ii. 22—24. Rom. xiv. 7—9. Rev. i. 12—20.) By his gospel he declares the works of the LORD throughout the earth; and "because he liveth," all his true disciples "shall live also." (Notes, John xiv. 18—20. Col. iii. 1—4.)

V. 19—24. David, preserved from death, triumphant over his enemies, and now going up to the temple to offer his thank-offerings, attended by the thousands of Israel, seems here to call upon the porters and other Levites, to open the gates of the sanctuary for his admission. These are called "the gates of righteousness;" because of the characters of those who offered acceptable worship in the courts of God, and because of the nature of the services there performed. They who were within seem to have sung responsive, "This is the gate of the LORD, into which the righteous shall enter:" and the whole company, perhaps in parts, sang the following verses. (Note, 14.) David's advancement to the throne, notwithstanding the opposition which had long been made to it, was referred to; but the whole passage is evidently a prediction of Christ.

When he arose from the grave, he ascended into heaven, as the forerunner of all his redeemed people; and he demanded the opening of those gates of righteousness, that he and they might enter in, and praise the Lord. (Notes, xxiv. 7—10. P. O.) The ministering angels may be considered, as opening the gates of heaven, into which the righteous alone can enter; and then the whole church in chorus, celebrates the praises of God, for having heard their prayers, and "become their salvation." The Redeemer doubtless is also that "stone, which the "builders rejected," and would have thrown aside as worthless among the rubbish; but which, by the mighty power of God, and to the astonishment of the apostles and disciples, became the chief corner-stone, supporting the whole spiritual temple, and uniting, the several parts of it into one building, "an habitation of God through the Spirit." (Notes, Matt. xxi. 40—44. Luke xx. 9—18. Acts iv. 5—12. Eph. ii. 19—22. 1 Pet. ii. 7, 8.)—And as the chief priests, scribes, and Pharisees of old refused this foundation-stone of the church; so, many of the wise and learned, and professedly religious, of every age and nation, ever since, have rejected it, and numbers of them have long endeavoured to substitute some other in its place. But by the marvellous interposition of the Lord, their attempts have been frustrated, and proved ruinous to themselves and their adherents alone.—The day of thanksgiving also, which David and Israel celebrated, was but a shadow of that blessed day which saw the Redeemer risen from the dead; that was indeed "the day, which the LORD had made," for his people to rejoice in; and it hath ever since been commemorated every week in the Christian church, and in most parts hath had a more solemn annual commemoration. (Notes 15, 16. John xx. 19—23. Acts xx. 7—12. 1 Cor. xvi. 1. 2. Rev. i. 9—11.) The twenty-second and twenty-third verses are quoted six times in the New Testament, and expressly applied to Christ; nay, many of the Jewish rabbis acknowledge this to be a prediction of the Messiah.

V. 25, 26. The word rendered, "Save now," is "Hosanna;" which seems equivalent to our modern congratulatory prayer on the accession of a monarch to the throne, "God save the king."—It is evident that the Jews had this passage in mind, when they said before Christ, at his entrance into Jerusalem, "Hosanna to the Son of David; blessed is he that cometh in the name of the LORD, Hosanna in the highest." They meant to welcome him as the promised Messiah; but they totally misunderstood the nature of his kingdom and salvation. (Notes, Matt. xxi. 8—11. Mark xii. 1—11. Luke xix. 28—40.) And our Lord himself also referred to this prophecy, when he said to the priests and rulers, "Ye shall not see me henceforth; till ye shall say, Blessed is he that cometh in the name of the LORD." (Note, Matt. xxiii. 37—39. P. O. 34—39.)—The priests from the sanctuary seem to have answered David and his company, in the latter clause, "We have blessed you out of the house of the LORD."

V. 27—29. The whole congregation, having now met in the courts of the sanctuary, joined in solemn sacrifices and ardent prayers; which were typical of the joy and praise of the church, on earth and in heaven, on account of the Redeemer's exaltation. (Marg. Ref. Note, cxxxvi. 1.)

PSALM CXIX.

Contains a miscellaneous collection of wise maxims, pious ejaculations, holy purposes, gracious experiences, &c. which cannot with ease and simplicity be arranged under any particular heads: there frequently being little connection between one sentence and another; and the whole being, as Mr. Henry remarks, 'rather a chest of gold rings, than a chain of gold links.'

to him by the promises of the new covenant; he will be sure to find abundant cause for joy and praise: he will desire to animate others in their several stations, to unite in this delightful work; and this always was, and always will be, the substance of the redeemed sinner's grateful song, "The LORD is good, because his mercy endureth for ever." No poor sinner, in deep distress, ever yet called earnestly upon him, who was not afterwards enabled to say, "The LORD answered me, with enlargement" of heart, hopes, and prospects; and every answer to our prayers is an evidence that he is on our side; and then we need not "fear what man can do unto us." Whether few or many help us, if he take part with them, they who hate us will be treated as enemies. If, indeed, we allow, (and who can doubt it?) that it is far better to trust in the LORD, than to put confidence even in princes; we should take care to act consistently with our judgment: we should not pay court to the rich and powerful, as if they could make us happy or miserable; but, without any undue compliances, we should conscientiously do our duty to them and to all men, and trust in the LORD alone to accept and bless us. We may indeed be compassed with enemies, and be disquieted by their malice; but, "in the name of the LORD" we shall be delivered from them, and victorious over them all, and their rage will only effect their own destruction. Even if Satan thrust sore at us, that we may fall into sin or misery; yet, trusting in our almighty friend, we may make head against him and his legions; for "the LORD is the strength and song" of every believer, "and is become his salvation." As we need not dread the rage, so we should not envy the carnal, vain, and vanishing mirth of the ungodly. For the voice of rational rejoicing, and of salvation, is in the tabernacles of the righteous; whilst they enjoy the love, are safe under the protection of the powerful and valiant right hand, and are employed in praising the name, of the LORD. With peace of conscience, and "joy in the Holy Ghost," and liberty to "cast all their cares upon him, who careth for them;" they possess a lively hope of an incorruptible inheritance; their bodies indeed must drop into the grave; yet, they shall not die eternally; but live, and declare the works of the "LORD;" and though he chasten them for their good, repeatedly and sharply, yet he will not "give them over unto death" eternal, nor leave their bodies in the grave for ever; but will bring them forth, immortal, and incorruptible; that "death may be swallowed up of victory."

V. 19-29. Renewed mercies and deliverances send believers, again and again, to the courts of the LORD, that they may enter in and praise his name; and at last, delivered from death and every evil, they will enter the gates of heaven to praise him for evermore.—He hath generally chosen and honoured those, whom man despised; he hath done good to his people by some, of whom it was said, "How shall these men save us?" And none are more apt to mistake and mislead others, in these matters, than they who by prescription are deemed, and deem themselves, "builders" in Zion.—We should not then be discouraged, by contempt and neglect, from "occupying with our talent, till the LORD come;" but attend to our proper work, whatever acceptance it may meet with from man, and desire no more than to be approved by God. "Every good gift is from him," and the glory of every good work belongs to him; and when beneficial changes are brought about, which "are marvellous in our eyes," we should acknowledge it to be his doing.—Gracious deliverances give occasion to days of joy and gladness; such are days, "which the LORD hath made," and we should remember to rejoice in a holy manner; for carnal wealth and sensual indulgence, when we are rejoicing in the goodness of God, are like offering his corn and wine to Baal. (Note, Hos. ii. 8. 9.) Our thanksgivings on earth must always be accompanied with prayers for further mercies, and the continuance of our prosperity; our hallelujahs with hosannas.—We should ever pray for those, who "come in the name of the LORD," and who evidently, in their proper station, act by his authority and for his glory: and the blessings of his servants, out of his sanctuary, should be highly valued by the greatest of princes, as highly conducive to their prosperity.—All our success should animate us to abound in spiritual sacrifices to the LORD, who giveth us light and comfort. If he is our God, our portion, and salvation, the object of our cordial worship, and the lord of our choice, we shall render him willing obedience, and exalt him as we are able: and thus we shall here begin, and for ever continue, to give thanks to him, who is "good, and whose mercy endureth for ever." In all these things our Redeemer is the grand pattern and exemplar of his people. Delivered from great distress, which he endured in our behalf; placed upon a glorious throne, according to his confidence in his heavenly Father, and in answer to his fervent prayers; having overcome every enemy, which compassed him about, or "thrust sore at him, that he might fall," and ever living to declare "the works of the LORD;" he hath opened the gates of righteousness to all his people; he hath become our way of access to his Father's presence, and the foundation of our hopes, and of our souls; and he hath shewn us the way to conquer, by patience, faith, and prayer. Contemned by the builders, he is become the foundation and corner-stone of the whole church: and his resurrection, ascension, and exaltation were marvellous in the eyes of numbers, who acknowledged and rejoiced in them as the LORD's doing. When he left the grave, a glorious day commenced, which knows no night: our "Sun of righteousness" arose, to set no more; and our weekly commemoration of that great event, on the LORD's day, is the earnest of our celebrating an eternal sabbath in heaven to his glory, and, if duly employed, a most blessed preparation for it. Let us then welcome the return of this "day, which the LORD hath made, and be glad and rejoice in it;" let us beseech him to send prosperity to the preaching of his gospel, and by it to save the souls of men: let us welcome those, who come as ambassadors in the name of Christ; as an evidence, that we welcome him to our hearts, and shall welcome him when he comes to judgment: and let us join our prayers for those who belong to the Redeemer, and every act of love to them, with our spiritual sacrifices of praise to him, our LORD, our God, our Saviour, and our portion.

NOTES.

PSALM CXIX. V. 1. It is generally allowed that David composed this most instructive psalm; and it is most probable, that he committed to writing, in a detached manner, the several reflections, maxims, and ejaculations, contained in it, as they occurred to his mind, amidst the varied scenes of his eventful life; and that, towards the close of it, he collected them in order, for the benefit of his people, and that of the church in every age.—The psalm consists of twenty-two sections, (each containing eight verses;) according to the number of the letters in the Hebrew alphabet: and every verse in each section, in the original, begins with that letter which stands as the title of it. It may be supposed that this arrangement was formed, principally, to assist the memory of the reader.—The psalm may be considered in a special manner as the touchstone of genuine experience: and as far as any man's views, desires, purposes, and affections, coincide with those of the psalmist, he may be sure that they come from the influence of the sanctifying Spirit, but no further. The reader's thoughts, indeed, will frequently be led to the Saviour himself; because he was perfectly what believers are in a measure: and their conformity to him is the evidence of their interest in his divine righteousness.—The word of God, under different terms, according to the several parts of which it is composed, is mentioned in almost every verse. Sometimes, indeed, the connection will lead the attentive reader to think more of one part than of others; but in general, "the oracles of God," as then extant, are intended; and it is probable, that the word was commonly selected, which best suited the metrical arrangement. Six, or seven distinct words, are used in the first section of eight verses, viz., law, testimonies, precepts, statutes, commandments, judgments, and ways. Most or all of these terms have been already explained; but in some instances, it will be necessary again to consider them, along with the context. (Notes, xix. 7-11. xxv. 10. xciii. 5. Ez. xxi. 1. Deut. vi. 1. xxxii. 3. 4. Neh. ix. 13. 14.)—As the pardoning mercy of God in Christ is the only source of a sinner's happiness; so the actual enjoyment of that happiness is inseparably connected with devoted obedience, and in great measure consists in it. (Notes, i. 1-4. xxxii. 1, 2. lxxxiv. 4. 5. xciv. 12-14. cvi. 3. Matt. v. 1-12. Rev. xxii. 14. 15.)—The word rendered "undefiled," means perfect, or upright, and marks the sound character, the true believer, who sincerely embraces the salvation of God, and conscientiously walks according to his commandments, in his habitual conduct. (Note, Job i. 1.)

V. 2, 3. The "testimonies" of God are the declarations of his truth and will, however attested; whether by express declarations, or by instituted ordinances, as pledges of his love to his upright worshippers: and they who credit his word, and attend on his ordinances, and thus seek him with an undivided heart, are happy, and shall be happy. (Notes, 129. Is. viii. 20. 1 John v. 9-13.) "Assuredly they practise no iniquity; they walk in his ways;" which "are pleasantness and peace." (Note, Prov. iii. 16, 17.)

V. 4. What then doth God command us, but diligently to do those very things, in which true happiness is to be found? What doth he forbid us, but to make ourselves and others miserable? (Marg. Ref.)

V. 5. 'David acknowledgeth his imperfection, desiring God to reform it, that his life might be conformable to God's word.' (Notes, xix. 7-14. Rom. vii. 13-25.)—'The faithful soul, enraptured with the contemplation of that blessedness, which is the consequence of serving God, but conscious, at the same time, of an inability to attain to it, sighs after the refreshing and strengthening influence of divine grace.—She groans earnestly within herself, and at length breathes forth a wish, that the Spirit of truth and love would fix and establish her in a holy course of thinking, speaking, and acting on all occasions; and would prevent her from turning aside out of it, to the right hand or to the left.' (Bp. Horne.)—The sudden transition, from the preceding reflections to this fervent ejaculation, is very beautiful.

V. 6. 'All the commandments have the same author, and the same sanction. He who thinketh to atone for one, by the observation of another, is a hypocrite, and, unless he repent, will be brought to shame, if not before men here, yet before men and angels hereafter.' (Bp. Horne.)—'Notwithstanding manifold imperfections, that man will never be thus put to shame, who unreservedly has respect to all God's commandments, as the rule of his conduct, and humbly repents of every deviation from them.' (Notes, 31. 128. Jam. ii. 8-13. 1 John ii. 26-29. iii. 18-24.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—8. It is the will of God that we should wisely seek our own happiness: our self-love indeed should be properly directed and subordinated, but it cannot, and ought not, to be extirpated.—Experience, as well as the sacred Scriptures, testifies, that "blessed are the undefiled in the way, who walk in the law of the Lord." Had sin never existed, misery had been unknown; and now that the way of pardon and reconciliation has been opened by the Lord Jesus Christ, we re-ascend to felicity, in proportion as we are renewed to holiness; and it is our highest privilege on earth to commune with God, and bear his image; to attend on his ordinances, rely on his promises, and, avoiding all iniquity, to "walk in his ways." Believers are indeed not exposed to the condemning sentence of the law: yet the Lord "hath commanded them to keep his precepts diligently;" and their obligations to obedience are increased in proportion to the mercies which they have received. This grateful obedience also corresponds to the dispositions of their hearts. The genuine disciple could not rely on the righteousness of Christ for justification; did he not see that excellency and beauty in it, which make him long to transcribe it in his own conduct, and to have his soul cast into the very mould of it. (Note, lxxxv. 10—13.) His heart consents to every precept of the holy law, that it is good; he would not have one of them repealed, mitigated, or altered, (Notes, 128. Rom. vii. 12.) he only grieves that he no more comes up to this perfect standard, and, with many a sigh, he says to the Lord, "Oh that my ways were directed to keep thy statutes!" He knows that if a man only respects some of the commandments, and expects by one instance of obedience to purchase an indulgence for disobedience in another, his hypocrisy will be detected by his partiality; and that if he be not made ashamed in this world, everlasting contempt will be his portion. (Note, Dan. xii. 2, 3.) Therefore he desires to "have respect unto all God's commandments." And as he could have no confidence before the mercy-seat now, so he could not hope to stand with confidence before the judgment-seat at last, if he allowed himself to despise or violate one of them. This man therefore will not only pray to be directed and enabled to obey, as far as he knows the will of God; but to be taught it, in all those things, which have hitherto been concealed from him: and he is disposed "with uprightness of heart," to praise the Lord for every new discovery which he makes in his righteous judgments. His desire and purpose are to keep the statutes of God, and his dependence is upon him, to enable him, and comfort him in so doing. The Lord may indeed, and often will, leave such a servant to feel his own weakness, when struggling with difficulties and temptations; yet he will hear his prayer, when he earnestly entreats him that he would not utterly forsake him. (Note, 2 Cor. xii. 7—10.)

NOTES.

V. 9. Many maxims and rules have been laid down, for regulating the manners, and forming the principles, of young persons: but a constant attention to their conduct, and an habitual comparison of their opinions, words, tempers, affections, and actions, with the sacred Scriptures, so as to aim daily at nearer and nearer conformity, is of itself sufficient; and without this all else is totally inadequate. We may suppose that David made this inquiry for his own use, in the dangerous and important season of youth; and then published it in his old age for the benefit of others. (Notes, xxxiv. 11—14. Ec. xi. 9, 10. xii. 1. 1 Tim. iv. 16. 2 Tim. ii. 20—22. iii. 14—17.)—He, who became man for our salvation, passed through this state of youth undefiled, that he might, as it were, reclaim, and consecrate it anew to God. Let every young man frequently meditate on this circumstance.' (Bp. Horne.)

V. 10. (Notes, 2, 3. 34. lxxviii. 36, 37. 2 Chr. xv. 12—15. Jer. iii. 6—11. xxxix. 11—14.) Oh let, &c. "Do not cause me to wander," &c.—The psalmist was conscious that God might justly reject his imperfect services; and that both the will and power of obeying, as well as pardon and acceptance, were to be sought from his free mercy and grace. (Marg. Ref. Notes, 36. cxli. 3, 4. cxliii. 8—12. Phil. ii. 12, 13.)

V. 11. David treasured up the truths, promises, precepts, and instructions of the sacred oracles, in his memory; and endeavoured to form his judgment, to direct his conscience, and to regulate his affections according to them; and having thus lodged them in his heart, they were securely hidden from every enemy, nor could he be robbed of them. Thus he used the Scriptures as his antidote against the contagion of sin and temptation. (Marg. Ref. Note, Col. iii. 16, 17.)

V. 12. 'Thou art perfectly holy and perfectly happy; O teach me thy statutes, that I may be partaker of thy holiness and happiness.' (Notes, 26. 68. 125. cxliii. 10. 1 Tim. i. 8—11. 1 John ii. 26—29. iii. 1—3. iv. 9—12.)

V. 13. (Note, 46.)—Judgments. This word seems to mean the decisions of the infinite wisdom and justice of God, whether they concern truths, facts, duties, or persons. By these decisions we ought to judge, and by them we shall be judged. (Notes, 66. 175. xcvii. 2. Neh. ix. 13. Ez. xx. 11. Rom. ii. 1—6.)

V. 14. 'Truth and holiness afford to the sincere believer a pleasure more exquisite, as well as more solid and enduring, than that which the miser feels at the acquisition of his darling wealth.—These true riches we may always acquire.' (Bp. Horne.) (Notes, i. 46—48. 97. 106. 111. 127. 128. 162. lxxiii. 5, 6. Job xxxiii. 8—12. Jer. xv. 15—18. Acts ii. 41—47. 1 Pet. i. 8, 9.)

V. 15. 'Meditation is that exercise of the mind, whereby it recalls a known truth, as some kinds of creatures do their food, to be ruminated upon, until all the nutritious parts are extracted and fitted for the purpose of life.' (Bp. Horne.) (Notes, 23. 147, 148. i. 1—3. James i. 22—25.)

V. 16. (Notes, 14. 93. 176. Deut. vi. 6—9. Prov. ii. 10, 11. iii. 1.)

V. 17. 'Recompense thy servant; I will live, and keep thy word.' Or, "Confer favour on thy servant, that I may live, and keep thy word." The verse may be understood either way.—He sheweth that we ought not to desire to live but to serve God.—If the Lord communicate to us the spiritual life abundantly, we shall be proportionably obedient to his word; and this will be both an additional obligation conferred on us, and a gracious recompense of our imperfect services hitherto. (Notes, 132, 133. xlii. 5, 6. cxvi. 7—9.)

V. 18. 'Reveal,' or unveil, "mine eyes," &c. (Note, 2 Cor. iii. 12—16.)—The moral law of God shewed the Israelites their need of a Saviour; and it also displays the holiness of God, the nature of heavenly happiness in conformity to him, and the believer's path through this evil world. (Note, Ex. xx. 1.) But under the ceremonial law, the wonders of redeeming love were veiled. Believers among the Israelites well knew, that the external institutions of the law typified some deep and spiritual mysteries: and they understood them, in proportion to their degree of divine illumination, and as far as it was necessary for their support, comfort, and direction in the path of life; yet, probably with much less distinctness, than real Christians now do. (Notes, Matt. xlii. 16, 17. Luke x. 23, 24. 1 Pet. i. 10—12.) But under every dispensation, the veil of prejudice, pride, and carnal affections, must be removed from the heart of fallen man; or he will never understand the nature and glory of divine truth.—'If the word of God be the lesson, the Spirit of God must be the teacher.' (Notes, Is. xxix. 9—12. 17—19. Matt. x. 25, 26. xlii. 10, 11. xvi. 17. Luke xxiv. 44—49. John vi. 44—46. Acts xvi. 13—15. xxvi. 16—18. 2 Cor. iv. 4—6. Eph. i. 15—23.)

V. 19—21. These verses contain arguments with which the psalmist enforced his plea for divine teaching. Being a stranger on earth, and journeying to his eternal home, he knew that he should lose his way, if the commandments of God were unknown to him, or mistaken by him. (Notes, 54—56. xxxix. 12. Gen. xlvii. 9. Heb. xi. 13—16. 1 Pet. ii. 11.) He had been led to desire the knowledge of the truths and precepts of revelation with such intenseness, that his soul was constantly ready to break, or faint, when at any time he dreaded being left in ignorance and error. (Notes, 40—131. lxxxiv. 1, 2. Prov. xlii. 12.) And he was sensible that the proud, the obstinate, impenitent sinner, remained under the wrath and curse of God, and would meet with severe rebukes here, as well as misery hereafter; and therefore he earnestly deprecated the doom of such wicked men. (Marg. Ref.) 'This disposition is not a transient fit; but it is constant and uniform at all times.' (Bp. Horne.)—'Seeing man's life in this world is but a passage, what should become of a man, if thy word were not his guide?'

V. 23. Saul and his courtiers, sitting in council, and speaking all manner of evil falsely against David, and conspiring together to take away his life; whilst he was meditating on, and praying over the word of God, that he might learn and practise his duty towards them and all men, and might find comfort from the precious promises, was a type of the Jewish sanhedrim, consulting together to put Jesus to death; whilst he was employed in healing and teaching the people, and doing all manner of good to those who were willing to receive benefit by him. (Note, 15. Marg. Ref.)

V. 24. The psalmist not only found his joy and comfort in the sure testimonies of God, but he made them his counsellors, and closely adhered to their decisions, as princes do to the unanimous opinion of their most approved advisers. (Notes, 14—105.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 9—24. The season of youth is peculiarly dangerous and important: the comfort and usefulness of future life often greatly depend on our conduct, when the passions are most strong, and we are most destitute of knowledge and experience; and the hopes of the church and of society for a succession of useful members, are placed upon the rising generation. Every one ought, therefore, to contribute all that is in his power to preserve young persons from the fatal effects of their own headstrong passions, of an ensnaring world, and of artful seducers, that they may not early contract bad habits, and form ruinous connections. And when young persons are convinced of the desirableness of having their way made and preserved pure from the pollution of sin, their general rule is, to take heed to it according to the precepts, cautions, and encouragements, of the word of God. Thus David, from his youth, sought the Lord with his whole heart; and, in answer to his prayers, was kept from "wandering from his commandments." He deposited the sacred Scriptures in his inmost soul, and was by them kept from sinning against God. Let every youthful reader copy this example; yea, let us all be thus followers of him, and of the Lord Jesus.—As God is both perfectly holy and perfectly happy, and as his blessedness is the result of his infinite excellency, how absurd must it be to expect happiness by being contrary to him, and rebelling against him! Rather let this be our plea with him to teach us his statutes, that, being partakers of his holiness, we may also participate his blessedness; and then we may with propriety and efficacy "declare the judgments of his mouth," for the instruction of others also. (Notes, xxxvii. 30, 31. 1. 16—21.) For the experienced believer finds far greater joy in the ways of his testimonies than wealth can confer, and these joys and riches alone are attainable by all who covet and seek them. But then we must frequently meditate upon the precepts of our God, reduce our knowledge to practice, and have respect to all his ways; and if we be careful not to forget any part of his word, we shall soon delight ourselves in his ordinances and commandments.—The Lord dealeth very bountiful with all his servants, who, being delivered from the wrath to come, and raised from the death of sin, find true life in keeping his word; but they need more and more mercies, and long for still more complete divine illumination. Every discovery which they make of the wondrous things revealed in the Scriptures, increases their earnest desire of having the eyes of their understanding opened to clear perceptions of divine truths; and every lively emotion of love and gratitude makes them long and pray for more fervent affections. As perfect knowledge and love are reserved for their portion in heaven, they feel themselves "strangers on earth:" they fear missing their way, even in part, lest they should lose the solace of walking with God, by erring from his commandments. Their anxiety on this account often interrupts their enjoyment, and makes them "groan, being burdened;" especially, if darkness and temptation so oppress their minds, as to render them afraid of having their portion with the proud and impenitent, whom God resists. This is the reproach which they most dread; though the contempt and calumny of men are sometimes distressing to their minds, and excite prayers for the removal of them. But when either princes or peasants speak against them, as the servants of God, they would be occupied in meditation on the Scriptures, not only because "their delight is in his testimonies," but because they desire from thence to be counselled how to behave, in order that, by well-doing, they may put to silence those who would falsely accuse them; and in every trouble and perplexity, they make them their "delight and their counsellors." Such are the desires, purposes, and experiences, of the true Christian, in proportion to his degree of knowledge and grace. May the Lord help us to look in this glass, that we may know what we are; and that we may be directed in exercising repentance of sin, and faith in Christ, and 'in amending our lives according to his holy word.' And may we learn to avoid all altercation with our

NOTES.

V. 25. Many understand this verse merely as a complaint on account of deep affliction, and peril of death, and as a prayer for the preservation of life. (Marg. Ref.) Yet, it is evident that the psalmist was conscious, that, compared with his better judgment, and the perfect standard of duty, his affections were exceedingly apt to cleave to worldly objects, which are but dust; and that he prayed for enlivening grace to render him more spiritually-minded. The word rendered "quicken me," signifies, 'cause me to live;' and may mean either, preserve my life, give me life, or let me have more abundant life; or, according to a mode of expression peculiar to our language, Let me be lively; Let me have "life more abundantly." (Notes, 37. 40. 88. 93. 159. lxxi. 20. 21. John x. 10—13. Rom. viii. 1, 2.) As the preservation of David's life from Saul's persecution was engaged for by special promise, so quickening grace, in answer to prayer, is promised in every part of Scripture, or, at least, such prayers accord to the spirit of the whole sacred volume.

V. 26. (Marg. Ref.) 'We should freely and ingenuously declare to God, in prayer, our sins, our temptations or sorrows, and our undertakings; it argues love, confidence, and sincerity; it is a means of acquainting us with our own state, of which generally we are ignorant; and it will not fail to procure those aids from above, of which we stand in need. God will hear us; he will pardon our offences, strengthen us in our trials, dispel our grief, and "prosper the work of our hands upon us." (Bp. Horne.)—It is worthy of special notice, how often, and in what varied connections, David in this psalm prays to be taught the statutes of God; though he seems to have been more intimately acquainted with the sacred oracles, as then extant, than almost any other man was; but he knew that divine teaching alone could enable him rightly to understand the Scriptures, and to apply general rules to all the variety of particular cases, which occurred in the course of his life. (Note, 12. Marg. Ref.)

V. 27. (Notes, lxxi. 16—18. cv. 8. Marg. Ref.)

V. 28. (Marg. Ref.) Heaviness. David's heaviness might in part arise from his outward trials; but he seems to have spoken as one distressed in mind, because he got no more ground against sin, and as needing strength to resist temptation. 'Let us not marvel if sin bring us to the knowledge of sorrow, since he who "knew no sin," was yet, on our account, so intimately acquainted with grief.—In the garden his soul melted for heaviness.—Our transgressions deserve an eternity of sorrow; let us not, therefore, repine at any portion of it that may fall to our share in time.—No, blessed Jesus, let us suffer with thee, both as a means and pledge of our future glorification with thee. Only strengthen us, according to the promises in thy word.' (Bp. Horne.)

V. 29, 30. "The way of lying," and "the way of truth," are here opposed to each other. "The way of truth" means, that true way which God hath revealed, by which we may come to him, and walk with him. The "way of lying" means, therefore, all those false ways, by which men deceive themselves and others, or are deceived by Satan and his instruments. False doctrine, hypocrisy, and whatever is contrary to the faith and holiness of the gospel, are intended by the way of lying. (Notes, 104. 128. cxli. 3, 4. Marg. Ref.)—The sound of the words, indeed, has led some to suppose that David had been habitually addicted to the sin of lying, from which he prayed to be delivered: and some instances are mentioned in which he deviated from truth. But though a believer may fall into any sin, he cannot habitually practise any one, knowing it to be so; and the original by no means admits of this lax interpretation.—"Grant me thy law graciously," is a prayer, that God would in mercy write his law in the psalmist's heart, and enable him to obey it; which he would consider a special instance of undeserved favour, or grace.—Having "chosen the way of truth," he laid the judgments of God before him for hourly direction and admonition.

V. 31. The word rendered "stuck," is the same which is before translated "cleave;" (Note, 25;) and the conflict between grace cleaving to the Lord's testimonies, and the remainder of in-dwelling sin "cleaving to the dust," is best understood by those who "delight in the law of God after the inward man, but find another law in their members warring against the law of their mind," so that "they cannot do the things that they would." (Notes, 1—5. Rom. vii. 13—25.)—The psalmist, however, adhered to the testimonies of God, so closely, notwithstanding this inward conflict, that neither temptations nor persecutions could induce him to draw back. So also did the apostle, and so do all that delight in the law of God. (Note, Acts xi. 23, 24.)

V. 32. "I will run the way of thy commandments; for thou wilt enlarge my heart." This is the most literal rendering, 'By this he sheweth, that we can neither choose good, cleave to God's word, nor run forward in his way, except he make our hearts large to receive grace, and willing to obey.' (Note, 45. Cant. i. 4. Luke i. 47—55. John vi. 44—46. viii. 30—36.)

33 "Teach me, O LORD, the way of thy statutes; and I shall keep <sup>it</sup> unto the end.

34 "Give me understanding, and I shall keep thy law; yea, I shall observe it with my whole heart.

35 "Make me to go in the path of thy commandments; for therein do I delight.

36 "Incline my heart unto thy testimonies, and not to covetousness.

37 "Turn away mine eyes from beholding vanity; and quicken thou me in thy way.

38 "Stablish thy word unto thy servant, who is devoted to thy fear.

39 "Turn away my reproach which I fear: for thy judgments are good.

40 Behold, I have longed after thy precepts: quicken me in thy righteousness.

41 "Let thy mercies come also unto me, O LORD, even thy salvation, according to thy word.

42 "So shall I have wherewith to answer him that reproacheth me: for I trust in thy word.

43 And take not the word of truth utterly out of my mouth; for I have hoped in thy judgments.

44 So shall I keep thy law continually, for ever and ever.

45 And I will walk at liberty: for I seek thy precepts.

46 I will speak of thy testimonies also before kings, and will not be ashamed.

47 And I will delight myself in thy commandments, which I have loved.

48 My hands also will I lift up unto thy commandments, which I have loved; and I will meditate in thy statutes.

V. 33. They, who are taught by the Lord "the way of his statutes," will keep it to the end: and the reason why so many draw back is intimated; namely, they have only been taught by men. (Notes, 1 John ii. 18, 19.)—He sheweth that he cannot follow on to the end, except God teach him oftentimes, and lead him forward.

V. 34. "Much understanding is needful, in order to the observation of the law; that we may know what is commanded, and what is forbidden, and how far; that we may avoid the snares laid for us in the way of duty; that we may respect things according to their due rank and worth; that we may do good works in their proper place, time, and manner; above all, that the affections may be directed by the judgment, not the judgment by the affections." (Bp. Horne.) "With my whole heart," not only in outward conversation, but also in inward affection. (Notes, 10. Prov. ii. 1—6. Phil. i. 9—11. James iii. 13—18.)

V. 35. Delight. "Happy the soul, that can say, 'Therein do I delight.'" (Bp. Horne.) The character described in the seventh of Romans, says, "I delight in the law of God, after the inward man;" and the longings and prayers, of the man after God's own heart, continually remind us of the struggles and complaints, spoken of in that well-known portion of holy writ. (Notes, Rom. vii. 12—25. Gal. v. 16—18.)

V. 36. In proportion as the heart is inclined by divine grace, to "the testimonies of God;" to desire what he promises and love what he commands, the inclination, or propensity, to covetousness must be mortified: and when the Lord leaves a man to himself, his heart will of course be inclined to evil, and idolatrously to seek happiness in worldly things. (Notes, Ex. xx. 3. 17. 1 Kings xxi. 1—7. P. O. Rom. vii. 7, 8. 1 John ii. 15—17.)—Hereby meaning all other vices, because that covetousness is the root of all evil. (Note, 1 Tim. vi. 10.)

V. 37. "Help me to overlook those worldly honours and fading beauties, which we are apt to behold with too much admiration; and, with lively affections and vigorous endeavours, to persist in the pursuit of thy favour, and in the way which thou hast set before me." (Bp. Patrick.)—The eyes seem put for all the senses, which are the inlets of temptation to the heart, and through which every kind of concupiscence is excited. (Notes, Gen. iii. 6. Josh. vii. 21. 2 Sam. xi. 1—5. Job xxxi. 1—4. 24—28. Prov. iv. 24, 25. xxiii. 4, 5. 31. Matt. v. 27, 28.)

V. 38. The promises of God's word greatly relate to the preservation and sanctification of the true believer. David, being conscious that he was the Lord's servant, and much afraid of offending or forsaking him, prayed to have these promises established, or performed, to his soul; that the effects of the deceitfulness of his heart, and of the force of temptation, might be prevented. (Notes, 49. 2 Sam. vii. 26—29.)

V. 39. "Let me not fall to thy dishonour; but let my heart still delight in thy gracious word."—The excellency of the judgments, decisions, maxims, or precepts of the sacred word, aggravate the guilt and disgrace of acting contrary to them; and this seems to have been the reproach of which David was especially afraid. (Notes, 22. 2 Sam. xii. 14. Matt. xviii. 7—9. 1 Tim. iii. 7. Tit. ii. 7, 8. 1 Pet. iv. 12—16.)

V. 40. (Notes, 5. 19—21.)

"Doth not my heart thy precepts love,

"And long to see thy face?

"And yet how slow my spirits move,

"Without enlivening grace!" (Watts.)

V. 41, 42. "He sheweth that God's mercy and love is the first cause of our salvation.—By trusting in God's word he assurth himself to be able to confute the slanders of his enemies." When David was driven away by Absalom, Shimei loaded him with reproaches: as if God had rejected him for his crimes, and as if his confidence in God had been presumptuous. (Note, 2 Sam. xvi. 5—15.)—When Christ was nailed to the cross, the chief priests reviled him, saying, "He trusted in God: let him deliver him now, if he will have him; for he said, I am the Son of God." (Note, Matt. xxvii. 39—44.) But the restoration of David to his throne, and the resurrection of Christ from the dead, furnished a sufficient answer to these reproaches: and the complete salvation of true believers will for ever silence and put to shame, all those who have derided and slandered them, during their trials and difficulties. (Notes, 38, 76, 77. 132. cvi. 4, 5. (Marg. Ref.))

V. 43. When David was left in uncertainty and distress, about his personal concerns, his confidence in discoursing upon the truths of the Scriptures, and the faithfulness of God to his promises, was abated: he therefore prayed that he might not be so far discouraged, as to be entirely put to silence on these favourite topics; (Notes, 46. ii. 12—15. lxxi. 17, 18.) seeing he had avowed his hope, that God would decide for him and against his enemies, according to his perfect wisdom, justice, and truth. (Notes, iii. 3—8.)—"Thou wilt not take," &c.

V. 44. The language of this verse is peculiarly emphatical, "I shall keep thy law perpetually, yea, for ever and ever." Perfect obedience will constitute a large proportion of heavenly happiness to all eternity. (Notes, Is. lxi. 1—3. John viii. 30—36. 2 Pet. ii. 18, 19.)

V. 45. (Note, Rev. vii. 13—17.) "I will walk about with enlargement," &c. as a man who, when confined in a prison, could only walk about in its contracted precincts, but being liberated, he walks at large, and goes to whatever place he pleases. (Notes, 32. Sam. xxii. 20.) The service of God is perfect freedom; every deviation is proportionable slavery to sin and Satan.

V. 46. David, before his accession to the throne, was often in the presence of Saul, and of Achish king of Gath, and afterwards he became a companion of kings: but he was determined in no case to conceal his religion, or to be ashamed of speaking his whole mind on that subject. (Notes, cxxxviii. 1. Matt. x. 16—20. xiv. 3—5. Acts xxiv. 24—29. xxv. 23. xxvi. 1—29.)

V. 47. (Notes, 16. 24. 103. 140. cxii. 1.)

V. 48. To "lift up the hands," implies earnestness and encouragement in any business: thus David purposed to take courage, and be very earnest in keeping God's commandments. (Marg. Ref. Notes, 15. i. 1—3.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 25—48. Whilst "the children of this world" cleave wholly to the dust of the earth as their portion, and are neither alarmed nor humbled on that account; "the children of light" are often greatly burdened, because of the remains of carnal affections in their hearts. Their judgment and choice lead them to "seek those things which are above:" yet they feel that their souls often grovel here on earth; and whilst others perhaps think that they are soaring to the very heavens in faith and love, they are complaining before God, that "their souls cleave to the dust;" and beseeching him to enliven the affections, and invigorate their endeavours, that they may rise superior to worldly cares and interests, and be more entirely taken up about the superior concerns of eternity. And his word encourages, and by his grace he will answer and grant, these good desires which he hath planted in our hearts.—The experienced believer communes with God in the confidence of faith and love: he unreservedly declares before him all his ways, and all the difficulties and perplexities with which he meets; nay, he confesses before him, without desiring to conceal, or to palliate any thing, all the sins of his life and of his heart; and the consciousness of this being his habitual practice encourages his hope of pardon and assistance from his heavenly Father. When we indeed desire to obey God's precepts, we may be sure that he will hear our prayers to be made acquainted with them: and with all our external advantages, we still need this divine teaching; for otherwise our natural pride, self-love, and love of sin, together with our contracted prejudices, will close our minds against the truth, and involve us in error and uncertainty.—They, who most delight in serving God, and in speaking of his wondrous works, may for a season be in great heaviness, and their souls be even "melted within them" through manifold temptations: but they will pray, and the Lord will hear; and he hath promised that "as their day is, so shall their strength be."—Having chosen the way of truth, and laid the Scriptures before us as our rule, we may pray in faith to be kept at a distance from all false doctrine and hypocrisy, and to be graciously led into a fuller knowledge of the Divine will; and sincerity in our hearts, towards God, will best preserve us from all dissimulation in our dealings with men. When we have entered upon this course of life, we must persevere in it: and the Lord will never suffer those to be put to shame, who "have stuck to his testimonies," stedfastly professing his truth, and doing his will, without being moved by the frowns or smiles of the world to turn aside from him.—But though the believer habitually travels the way to heaven; yet he is often grieved to find that he gets on no faster; and he still prays to be set at liberty from every remainder of the bondage of sin, "that he may run the way of God's commandments with an enlarged heart." He desires to proceed with increasing speed, even unto the end; he wants knowledge in order to practise: he measures the degree of men's wisdom by that of their piety and obedience to God; he prays to be made 'of good understanding in the way of godliness;' and to be inclined and enabled to walk in it, not only because it is the path of duty, but because he delights in it. Yet he still feels his heart capable of entertaining an inordinate desire after worldly things, and of coveting wealth by which they may all be purchased. Against these emotions of covetousness he watches; and he prays unto his God not to permit his heart to be in any degree inclined to it. He knows that all below is vanity and vexation of spirit: but he fears lest through the outward senses concupiscence should be excited in his heart: and therefore he intreats the Lord to "turn away his eyes" from vanity, and to close all his senses against every object, which can pollute his imagination, or kindle forbidden desires in his heart; or which might cause him to loiter in that way, in which he would be quickened and not retarded. He therefore pleads the promises of God, and desires that they may be confirmed and fulfilled to him; as one who would devote himself to the fear and worship of his name: and he prays to be delivered from the reproach of hypocrisy, or apostasy, or a disgraceful walk, which he more dreads than the contempt of men.—Knowing that all the judgments of God are just and good, he above all things dreads falling under his rebuke, or condemnation; and to be assured of escaping them, he longs after his precepts, and to make progress in his righteousness. But when he hath done all, he feels himself to be a poor sinful creature: his only dependence still is upon the rich mercies of God; and he desires the salvation which is promised in his word. Every present deliverance from sin and trouble serves to silence the reproaches of his calumniators: and he knows that when his salvation shall be completed, every accuser will be answered, and every aspersion wiped from his character. In the mean time he wants encouragement and assistance in speaking the word of truth, concerning the happiness of God's people, and his righteous judgments, for the quickening of some, and the conviction of others, with whom he converses. He has no idea of final happiness, or of perfect liberty, but in keeping the Divine "law continually, even for ever and ever;" and therefore he now seeks out God's precepts, that he may obey them; in order that on earth he may, as much as possible, anticipate the liberty and felicity of heaven. (Note, 1 John iii. 1—3.) Should such a believer be called, either by the duties of his station, or by persecution, to stand before kings; he will neither be ashamed, nor afraid, to speak concerning the testimonies of God, with all plainness and simplicity: but how wonderful it is, that such a glorious subject should expose a man to shame and contempt; and that especially, it should so often be disgracefully excluded from the courts of kings, nay, almost from their chapels. (Notes, Am. vii. 12, 13. P. O. 10—17.) If bonds and imprisonment should be the consequence; he will find delight in those commandments which he hath loved: and in every case, he will seek his pleasure, not from the indulgence of sensual appetites or malignant passions, but in diligently studying and obeying the commandments of his God. Something of this mind of Christ is in every true disciple; but very few of them have arrived at that maturity of judgment, and vigour of holy affections, which David possessed. Our evidence, however, that we are the people of God is exactly proportionable. All is defective in our judgment and affections, which comes short of this; all false and delusive in our supposed experience, which runs counter to it.

NOTES.

V. 49. The psalmist may perhaps here especially mean the promise of the kingdom over Israel to himself and his posterity, which God had made to him, when he thought of no such thing; and thus raised in him expectations, which subsequent events threatened to frustrate.—But the same plea is good, as to any expectation, which is clearly grounded on the word of God; 'Remember, O Lord, that thou hast given this promise, and encouraged my hope in it: and, whatever appearances may be, I must wait and pray for the accomplishment of it; for thou wilt never disappoint the expectation, which thy own word hath excited.' (Notes, Gen. xxxii. 9—12.) (Marg. Ref.)

V. 50—53. Some render these verses in connection, as follows: "This is my comfort in my affliction: that thy word quickens," or enlivens, "me; that, while the proud exceedingly deride me, I do not decline from thy law; that I remember thy righteous judgments of old, and thence encourage myself; that the tempest arises against me from the wicked, who forsake thy law."—The effect of the sacred word in animating the psalmist's hope, zeal, and diligence; his consciousness of adhering to the commands of God, though "filled with the contempt of the scornful;" his meditation on the righteous judgments of God on his enemies, and his interpositions in behalf of his servants; and the evidently bad character of his furious persecutors, combined to encourage his hope of a happy event to his distresses. (Notes, lxxvii. 5—13. xix. 21. Rom. v. 3—5.)—Or, The "horror" which he felt, when he reflected on the doom that awaited the wicked, was a "testimony of his conscience," that he was actuated by a spirit of love, and not of revenge; and thus a source of comfort. (Marg. Ref. Notes, 135, 157, 158. Rom. ix. 1—3.)—The haughty infidel will scoff at the true servant of God, for one part of his conduct; the insolent worldling will ridicule him for another: but neither will induce him to disbelieve, or disobey.' (Bp. Horne.)—'I have called to mind, O Lord, how, in all foregoing ages, thou hast suffered good men to fall into calamities, thereby to render them at last the more illustrious: and with this consideration also I comforted myself.' (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 54—56. The psalmist in these verses still seems to be pointing out the sources of his consolation.—In his wanderings from place to place like a weary pilgrim, wherever he pitched his tent, he solaced himself, by composing and singing hymns and psalms, in praise of the statutes and ordinances of God. (Notes, 19. Heb. xi. 9—13.) He meditated, when others slept, on the Divine perfections, and thus was confirmed in his purposes of obeying the Divine law: and indeed all his supports, and the cheerful composure of his mind under his dangers and calamities, were a gracious recompense of his obedient regard to the word of God. (Notes, 165. xix. 7—11. 2 Sam. xxii. 21—28. Marg. Ref.)

V. 57—63.—In the former section, the psalmist stated the chief sources of his consolation: in this, he expresses his full confidence, that God was his "portion;" and "the reason of this hope that was in him." (Note, 1 Pet. iii. 13—18.) He had formed, and avowed, his purpose of adhering to the words of God, keeping them as his valued treasure, and observing them in his habitual conduct. (Notes, 106, 115—117. Marg. Ref.) He had earnestly from his inmost soul sought the favour of God, and the mercy promised in his word. (Notes, 41. 76. cvi. 5, 6.) He had thought on his ways, in order that he might repent of all his sins, and do works meet for repentance; forsaking every evil course, and turning his feet into the paths of truth and holiness. Having "come to himself," and "considered his ways;" he made no delay to comply with the dictates of his conscience, in obeying God's commandments: (Marg. Ref. Note, Ez. xviii. 28.) And when the wicked laid snares for him, robbed him, or persecuted him; he was not, by this unmerited ill usage, so discomposed as to forget the law of God; but still made it the rule of his conduct. Nay, his distresses and dangers rendered him the more earnest in his religion; and every interposition of God for his deliverance and the confusion of his persecutors; and the recollection of the Lord's righteous judgments of old, excited in him such lively gratitude, that he often arose even in the middle of the night to bless and thank his God. (Notes, 147, 148. 164. Mark i. 35—39.) At the same time, he chose for his companions, not the most wealthy, ingenious, or valiant, but the most pious persons whom he knew; and, while hated by the wicked, he was welcomed, with affection and reciprocal regard, by all who feared God and kept his precepts. (Note, xvi. 2, 3.) He could appeal to the searcher of hearts for the truth of all this; and therefore he could not doubt, but that the Lord was "his portion," and his everlasting felicity.—It is exceedingly desirable to be habitually disposed to bless God in all circumstances; as there is no situation on earth, in which a sinner has not cause to be thankful; much more a believer. We are not indeed required to arise at midnight to give thanks to our God; but if we are by any means kept from sleep, it will prove a comfortable and profitable employment: and when we consider for what vile purposes multitudes are awake at that hour; we shall feel some

V. 65. (Notes, xlii. 5, 6. xliii. 5, 6. cxxxviii. 2, 3.)

V. 66. This verse may literally be rendered, "Teach me goodness, judgment, and knowledge; for I have believed thy commandments."—"Thou hast shewn great kindness to me, O Lord, teach me to imitate thy goodness."—"The word (translated "judgment") signifies, the faculty of discerning, distinguishing, and judging rightly of things moral and spiritual; as the palate doth of meats, by their different flavours and qualities. Without this taste...we mistake falsehood for truth in our studies, and wrong for right in our practice; superstition and enthusiasm may pass with us for religion, or licentiousness may intrude under the notion of liberty: in a word, our learning and knowledge prove useless, if not prejudicial to us. A sound mind therefore, should, above all things, be desired of God in our prayers." (Bp. Horne.) (Notes, Job xii. 11, 12. xxxiv. 1-4. 1 Cor. ii. 14-16. Phil. i. 9-11. Heb. v. 11-14.)—David had believed the divine authority and excellency of the holy law, and that it was worthy of all obedience; the rule of happiness, as well as of duty. (Note, 128. Neh. ix. 13.)

V. 67. 'He confesseth, that before he was chastened, he was rebellious, as man by nature is.'—"The use of God's rod is to bring us home to himself; (Marg. Ref.) (Notes, 71. 75. lxxiii. 5-9. 2 Chr. xxxiii. 9-19. Job v. 17. Jer. xxxi. 18-20. Heb. xii. 5-13.)

V. 68. 'Thou art kind, O Lord, and in thy kindness teach me thy statutes.' (Sept.) 'Thou art, in thine own nature, kind and good,—who designest our good, even when thou afflictest us; take what methods thou pleasest with me, only teach me effectually to do as thou wouldest have me. (Bp. Patrick.)—The psalmist seems to say, Thou art so good, that I shall consider the sharpest afflictions as sent in kindness, in order to teach me thy statutes.' (Marg. Ref.) (Notes, xciv. 12-14. 2 Sam. xxii. 36. Prov. xxvii. 6. Matt. xiv. P.O. 22-36.)

V. 70. The fat in animals is supposed to be without feeling. That insensibility of heart to God's promises, threatenings, and judgments, and to the concerns of other men, which result from indulged luxury, lust, or avarice, are aptly described by this similitude. (Note, Is. vi. 9, 10.—The same word is here used: but no where else in the Old Testament.)—"Their heart is indurate and hardened with prosperity and vain estimation of themselves."—"The word of God is 'the delight of temperate and holy persons, who gladly fly from large companies, full tables, costly meats, and rich wines, to enjoy in private the more exalted pleasures of abstinence, meditation and prayer.' (Bp. Horne.) (Marg. Ref.)

V. 71. (Notes, 67. 75. 76. Rom. v. 3-5. 1 Cor. xi. 29-34. 2 Cor. i. 1-7. iv. 13-18. Jam. i. 2-4.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 49-72. The Lord himself teaches and enables his servants to rely on his word: yet he often delays to answer their expectations, in order to excite their desires, to exercise their faith, to prove their sincerity, and to perfect their patience. This leads them to remind him of his promises, and humbly to plead for the accomplishment of them. Thus they often find the sweetest comforts when they are most afflicted: for as the sacred word was the instrument, by which they were "quickened when dead in trespasses and sins;" so the Comforter arrives and cheers them, when they are ready to faint under trials, by giving them cordials from the same unfailing resource.—Infidels, pharisees, covetous men, libertines, and all the sons of pride and rebellion, will deride as visionaries and enthusiasts those, who thus speak of communion with God and joy in him: but we must not on that account "decline from his word." (Note, 1 John i. 3, 4.) The remembrance of his judgments of old on the despisers of his servants, and his deliverance of them from trouble, may give us comfort under such contempt: and the prospect of that perdition which awaits the impenitent, may well fill us with horror whenever we think of them, and turn all our resentment into compassion and prayers.—The believer dwells on earth, in the body, as in the house of his pilgrimage; ere long he will be "absent from the body and present with the Lord:" in the mean time the word and works of God supply him with subjects for joyful meditation and grateful praise. In the season of affliction, and in the silent hours of the night, he remembers the name of his God, and is thus animated to cheerful obedience:

and the Lord graciously recompenses these services, by rendering the observance of his precepts daily more easy and pleasant.—Who can be sufficiently thankful, that sinners when penitent may rejoice in the infinite and all-sufficient God, and hope that he will, to all eternity, employ his perfections in rendering them happy! But what words can express the folly and madness of those, who prefer this present world as their portion, though it is connected with the everlasting wrath of God! Yet so depraved is man, that we are all disposed to make this wretched choice; and special grace alone can enable us to say from our experience, "Thou art my portion, O Lord; I have said, that I will keep thy words." Yet surely the favour of the Almighty is worthy of being "intreated with our whole heart;" we cannot be too instant with him to be "merciful unto us according to his word;" and no one ever thus intreated him in vain.—We should frequently think on our ways, and review our past and present conduct with great accuracy, comparing all our thoughts, words, and works with the law of God; if we would either perceive our perishing want of the salvation of the gospel, or our need of repentance, and of turning our feet into the ways of holy obedience. (Note, Jam. i. 22-25.)—As the interests of eternity are at stake, it behoves sinners to make haste and not delay, to escape from the brink of that tremendous precipice, on which they have long trifled; and the believer will be equally in haste to obtain assurance of his safety, and to glorify his God by keeping his commandments.—If the wicked combine to defraud us of our property, and "the proud forge lies" against us; we should be rendered the more obedient and attentive to the precepts of God, that we may ensure the true riches, and live down calumny.—It argues great grace, when we can be cheerful and thankful under great injuries, without being interrupted, (by regretting our losses, or resenting ill usage,) from praising the Lord for all his righteous judgments; and when troubles and dangers which break our rest, only make us solace ourselves the more with thankfulness for our remaining unmerited mercies.—The more the wicked hate God's people, the greater union should subsist among them; that they may comfort, and edify, and pray for, each other. (Note, John xv. 17-21.) Thus the communion of saints assists, as well as evidences, their communion with God. In this grand concern party distinctions and other discriminations should be but little regarded: for were we all like our Master, even the saint upon a throne would associate with the saint in a cottage, without deducting from his real dignity, and without leading his poor brother to neglect the duties of his inferior station: and we should all prefer the company of the meanest and simplest who fear God and keep his precepts, to that of the most polished, ingenious, or honourable of the ungodly.—As the earth is filled with the unmerited blessings of providence, and with the glad tidings of free salvation; we should be instant in prayer to be taught the statutes of the Lord, that our hearts also may be filled with his mercy, grace, and peace: and repetitions in our requests will not be condemned, unless they be vain and unmeaning. (Note, Matt. vi. 7, 8.)—Every past mercy of God to his servants, according to his word, encourages them to pray for more wisdom and grace; that "their love may abound more and more in knowledge and in all judgment;" and that having believed, they may experience, the happiness of keeping God's commandments.—To the reproach of our fallen nature, prosperity commonly produces ungodliness; and adversity is the frequent means of exciting men to the consideration of religious subjects. Many have said, "Before I was afflicted I went astray; but now I have kept thy word:" and "It was good for me, that I was afflicted, that I might learn thy statutes." This should reconcile the afflicted to their trials, and teach them to improve them; and it should lead us all to leave our concerns to the disposal of God, seeing we know not what is good for us. For it is far better to learn by sufferings to delight in God's word, and to value it "more than thousands of gold and silver;" than by prosperity to grow callous, and ripe for eternal destruction.—But how dreadful is the case of those who are hardened in sin, even in the furnace of affliction! Let us then still beseech our God, "who is good, and doeth good," to teach us his statutes, and to incline our hearts to faith, obedience, and submission to his holy will.

NOTES.

V. 73. 'Thy hands have made and established me; "Make me wise, and I shall learn thy commandments;" and thus be capable of answering the grand purpose of my creation.' (Notes, 126. c. 3. cxxxix. 13-18. Job x. 8-13. Marg. Ref.)

V. 74. 'It will be a great encouragement to all good men, when they see me delivered out of all these troubles: for thereby they will be confirmed in their belief of thy faithfulness to thy promises; on which, it will appear, that I have not vainly depended, though I stay long for the performance.' (Bp. Patrick.)—David's cheerfulness under his trials, also, was suited to comfort the hearts of those pious persons who witnessed it. (Notes, xxxii. 6, 7. xxxiv. 4-6.)

V. 75. "These heavy afflictions which have befallen me are perfectly righteous, and will only make thy faithfulness at last the more illustrious." (Bp. Patrick.) (Notes, Deut. xxxii. 3, 4. Jer. xii. 1-3. Lam. iii. 21-36.)—It should also be noted, that chastening is a promised blessing to the children of God: who are bound to own the fulfilment of the promise, while enduring the salutary discipline. (Notes, 67, 68. 71.)

V. 76. The persuasion that sin is pardoned and God reconciled; with peace in the heart and conscience by the power of the Holy Spirit, according to the promises of Scripture, will make the believer comfortable even before his trials are removed. For this David prayed, as well as for deliverance. (Notes, 41, 42. xxv. 10, 11. cvi. 4, 5.)

V. 77. Without pardoning mercy, the sinner remains under the sentence of eternal punishment; and without experiencing the tender compassion of God, the believer has little enjoyment of life here, or hope of eternal life hereafter: but they who delight in the law of God, will surely at last rejoice in his tender mercies. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 78, 79. Or, "The proud shall be ashamed," &c. "Those that fear thee, and have known thy testimonies, shall be turned to me." (Notes, 19-23. 85. xxv. 22, 23. xxxv. 25-28. cxlii. 7.) It may be considered as the language of assured hope, rather than of prayer. Many other verses may be read in the same manner.

V. 80. The word rendered "sound," signifies perfections. Soundness of heart denotes thorough integrity and sincerity, in professed dependence on God and devotedness to him; and this is opposed to every kind and degree of hypocrisy; as the vigorous appearance, which springs from a firm and healthy constitution, differs from that corpulency and florid complexion, frequently attending some fatal diseases, or a decay of the vital parts. (Notes, xxv. 21. xxvi. 9-11. John i. 47-51. 1 John ii. 26-29. iii. 18-24.)

V. 81, 82. Some think that David here spoke the language of the ancient church, as waiting for the coming of the promised Messiah, "the salvation of God," and the consolation of Israel. But he seems rather to have expressed the state of his mind; whilst he expected to be delivered by his merciful God, from his sins, his foes, and his fears. Nothing short of this could satisfy his soul: for this he longed, and hoped on the ground of God's promises; but "hope deferred made his heart sick and faint;" and his eyes were fatigued, and failed, in looking out for the tokens and comforts of this expected salvation; as all know to be the case, when they long and look in vain, for the arrival of some expected and much loved friend. (Notes, 19-21. 40-42. xlii. 1-4. xlii. 1-3. lxxxiv. 1, 2. Cant. ii. 5.)

V. 83. Bottles made of skins would shrivel up, and become unsightly and useless, by hanging in the heat and smoke. Thus David seemed to himself to become useless and despicable, through the infirmities of age, and his manifold trials and sufferings. (Notes, cii. 3-11. Job xxx. 25-31. Matt. ix. 16, 17.)

V. 84. David here either enquired how long the Lord would permit his servant to be thus afflicted; or, whether he meant him to spend all his remaining days under persecution; and to close his life, without seeing God arise to plead his cause, and avenge him on his unrighteous persecutors. (Notes, lxxxix. 46-48. xc. 13-17.) The time seemed long, from Samuel's anointing David to the kingdom, till God, by inflicting judgment on his persecutors, fulfilled his promises: especially as it was spent in great danger and hardship. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 85. In order to take the wild beasts, in those countries where they abound, they dig deep pits, and cover them over carefully with turf, supported by slender twigs; and the wild beasts, attempting to walk over these pits, fall in, and are taken alive. Thus David's enemies employed craft, as well as power, for his ruin; without regard to the law of God, nay, in direct contempt of it. (Notes, 78. vii. 14-16. xxxv. 4-9. xxxvi. 10, 11. Prov. xvi. 27. Jer. xviii. 19, 20.)

V. 86. The psalmist contrasts the commandments of God, as requiring truth, and faithfulness; with the unfaithful and iniquitous conduct of his persecutors; and this encourages his hope and prayer for deliverance.—"All thy commandments are truth." (Notes, 66. 142. vii. 1-5. Matt. v. 10-12. Luke vi. 21-23. 1 Pet. iv. 12-16.)

V. 87. (Notes, xciv. 16-18. cxxiv. 1-3. 2 Cor. i. 8-11. Marg. Ref.) V. 88. "Preserve my life, raise me from this death-like condition, animate me by thy grace; that I may keep thy testimonies." (Notes, 25. 40. 159. John x. 10-13.)

V. 89, 90. Or, "Thou art for ever, O LORD, thy word," &c. The word of God is as unchangeable and everlasting as his own existence. It is established "in the heavens," beyond the reach of the revolutions of this lower world: and its accomplishment is as certain, as the motions of the heavenly bodies, which are not at all affected by the convulsions and vicissitudes of the earth and its inhabitants. (Marg. Ref. Notes, Col. i. 5-8. iii. 1-4. 1 Pet. i. 3-5.)

V. 91. The heavens and the earth, and all the hosts of them, still keep their station, or perform their courses, according to the original appointment of the Creator: and shall man, who alone is endued with reason, and formed for immortality, be single in rebellion against him? (Notes, Gen. viii. 20-22. ix. 8-17. Deut. iv. 19. Is. xlviii. 12-15. Jer. xxxiii. 19-23.)

V. 92. David delighted to study the word of God: he took pleasure in the truths, promises, and precepts contained in it; and thus he was preserved from sinking under the weight of his troubles. He was directed how to act in the most difficult circumstances, and escape the destructive machinations of his enemies; and he derived encouragement from the most afflictive situations. (Notes, xxvii. 13. xciv. 7-19.)

V. 93. The benefit, which the psalmist had often derived from the precepts of the sacred word, by means of which he had been made alive to God, and animated in his service, greatly endeared them to him; and having hid them in his heart, he was persuaded he should never forget them. (Notes, 50-53. Jam. i. 16-18. 1 Pet. i. 22, 23.)

V. 94. "He proveth by effect, that he is God's child; because he seeketh to understand his word."—"Let it be remembered, that no man can say to God, with a good conscience, "I am thine;" unless he can also go on and say, "I have sought thy precepts."—"Since, after all, "his servants we are to whom we obey;" and if sin be our master, how can we say to a master, whose interest is directly opposite, "I am thine?" (Bp. Horne.) (Notes, 159. 166. 173. 174. Rom. vi. 16-19.)

V. 95. Amidst the virulent persecution of the wicked, the psalmist considered the sure testimonies of God, or his truths and promises; till his fears were allayed, and his heart was established in confidence and obedience. (Notes, 2, 3. 11-14. 111. xix. 7-11.)

V. 96. "David in his time had seen Goliath, the strongest, overcome; Asahel, the swiftest, overtaken; Abithophel, the wisest, befooled; and Absalom, the fairest, deformed." (Henry.) He had seen the vanity of all created good; the vexation of that estate which men account the summit of earthly bliss; the imperfection of the most accomplished human characters; the wretched close of the most prosperous lives; and the miserable disappointment of those, who trusted in men, or idolized earthly possessions and enjoyments. The more he was acquainted with men and worldly things, the deeper was his conviction, that the former were imperfect at best, and the latter wholly insufficient to make him happy; but the fuller knowledge he attained of the sacred Scriptures, the more excellent, extensive, and perfect they appeared; a perfect rule for his conduct, and ground for his hope, a guide to happiness, and a source of present comfort. Or, the more fully he understood the extent, spirituality, and excellence of the Divine law, the more clearly he discerned the imperfection of all human obedience: "by the law is the knowledge of sin;" the breadth of the commandment shews the scantiness of man's best righteousness, and recommends the righteousness of the Redeemer, as alone commensurate with its extensive and holy requirements, (Notes, Mark xii. 28-34. Rom. iii. 19, 20. vii. 7-12;) and the whole word of God shall endure for ever, when all things on earth shall come to an end and perish. (Note, 1 Pet. i. 24, 25.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 73-96. The Lord hath "made us, and fashioned us" capable, by the faculties of our rational souls, of knowing, loving, worshipping, and enjoying him; but we are now rendered incapable, by the blindness of our understandings, and the depravity of our hearts, of this employment and felicity: yet, the gospel opens a way for our recovery to the image of God, and the capacity of his service and favour: we ought therefore continually to beseech him by his Holy Spirit, to give us understanding, that we may learn and do his will; and our prayers will be prevalent, when they spring from an humble desire of being enabled by his grace, to answer the end of our creation and redemption.—They who fear and serve God, love to associate together, and to converse concerning their common faith and hope in his word; but they are especially rejoiced, when they see such as have trusted in the promises of God, under very severe trials, and have been delivered; because this relieves their fears, and encourages their hopes.—It is easy to acknowledge that "all the judgments of God are right," with reference to others; but, to be fully assured of this truth, when his afflicting hand lieth heavy on us; and to allow his wisdom, justice, goodness, and faithfulness, under our acutest sufferings, is no common attainment even among true believers; and as far as this assurance prevails, we shall be preserved from repining, and rendered thankful and submissive under every trial. It is, however, evident, not only that God is faithful and merciful, though he afflict his people; but that "he afflicts them in faithfulness and mercy;" such loving corrections are promised in his covenant, and without them we should be ruined. But, whilst we are taking these needful, but unpleasant medicines, we may beg of the Lord that his merciful kindness may be for our comfort; and faith, patience, and prayer will surely make way for the consolations of the Holy Spirit. For the abundant mercies and tender compassions of our Father come to all, who trust in him, and delight in his law; and they shall neither sink in trouble, nor be finally baffled by temptation; for as their Redeemer liveth, they shall live also, even for ever and ever.—The pride and blasphemy, the perverseness, iniquity, oppression, and deceit of the enemies of God, are certain forerunners of their confusion and destruction; and whilst his servants "meditate on his testimonies," they may despise the boastings, menaces, and insults, of those, who hate them for righteousness' sake. Indeed, it is best, in such circumstances, to live retired, and to commune with our God, our Bibles, and our own hearts; lest we be engaged in contentions, which produce only sin and sorrow. But when they who "fear God, and have known his righteous judgments," imbibe jealousies and prejudices, and become reserved, or opposers of us, the trial is very heavy. We ought, however, to examine our conduct, and be humbled for those sins and indiscretions, which have occasioned this unfavourable opinion concerning us; and we should then apply to him, who hath all hearts in his hand, beseeching him to turn them unto us, that they may counsel and comfort us in our difficulties. Above all, we should pray for "a sound heart," in God's statutes; and then all aspersions, or suspicious appearances, will vanish in due time, and our disgrace will terminate in honour, either here or in a better world. (Notes, xxxvii. 5-8. 32, 33. Rom. viii. 33-39.) But shame will be the lot of hypocrites, more than of any other workers of iniquity.—Happy are they who long for the salvation of God, and hope in his word, waiting for the performance of his promises, in attendance on his ordinances, and obedience to his precepts. Their intense desires, and sharp trials, may make their souls ready to faint; and delays may cause their eyes to fail, whilst they are saying, "when wilt thou comfort me?" Afflictions, slanders, infirmities, and persecutions may render them despised, and thrown aside as a broken vessel, or "a bottle in the smoke;" but as they do not forget God's statutes, he will not be regardless of their distresses. The days of their mourning shall be ended: though they appear tedious, they are but for a moment, compared with that eternal felicity, which they are working out for them; and at length vengeance will be executed on all who harassed, and tried to ensnare them, in defiance of the authority and law of God.—The commandments are true and faithful guides in that path of peace and safety, which the testimony of God reveals, and his promise secures to every believer.—Nature is most disquieted by suffering wrongfully; but faith and grace are encouraged by that very consideration; for we cannot so confidently expect help from God, when we suffer as evil-doers, as when, like our Master, we do well and suffer for it.—

Wicked men may almost consume the believer on earth; but, as neither fear, nor dejection under sufferings, induce him to forsake the Divine precepts; so the Lord will support him in obeying them, and deliver him out of all his troubles; and should men prevail to kill the body, they will only liberate the soul, and hasten its entrance on unsullied joys. We should therefore seek in the first place to be invigorated and animated, by the lovingkindness of the Lord, to hold fast his truth, and adhere to his precepts; and then we may cheerfully leave all our concerns in his hands. For the engagements of his covenant are established on a firmer basis, than the earth itself; his faithfulness remaineth to all generations, and to eternity; and all the hosts of heaven, in serving the Lord, and doing his will, concur in accomplishing his promises to his people. May we have grace, in our respective places, to do his will in like manner: then we may be sure that we shall not perish in our afflictions, and every recollection of his precepts will animate our hopes, and enliven our affections; as by them the Lord at first quickened us, when we were dead in sin. Thus shall we know that we are the Lord's, by his choice and purchase of us, and by our choice of him, and devotedness to him; and, seeking to know and do his precepts, and considering his testimonies, we may be sure of his salvation, however the wicked wait for us to destroy us.—In fine, the enlarged knowledge of the word of God, in its length and breadth, will mar our relish for the pleasures of sin, lessen our value of all earthly good, and take us off from all confidence in man, or in our own wisdom, strength, and righteousness. Thus we shall be led to seek our comfort and felicity from God alone; and to receive Christ Jesus as our "wisdom, righteousness, sanctification, and redemption." Being thus interested in his perfect obedience, we shall learn to copy his perfect example; and shall neither be satisfied with an imperfect holiness, nor with any portion, which is not vast as our capacities, and durable as our existence.

NOTES.

V. 97. 'He sheweth that we cannot love God's word, except we exercise ourselves therein, and practise it.'

V. 98-100. 'The "commandments of God" were ever with David; the "testimonies" of God were his meditation; and "the precepts" of God it was his care to observe: therefore his wisdom exceeded the policy of his enemies, the learning of his teachers, and the experience of the ancients.' (Bp. Horne.)—In David's circumstances, it was hardly possible that he should not be conscious of this; seeing every day's experience and observation confirmed it. In judging thus, he thought "soberly of himself, and as he ought to think;" unless he "would call good evil and evil good, and put light for darkness and darkness for light;" and he gave the whole honour of his proficiency to God, who had by his word given him this 'good understanding in the way of godliness.' It would not, however, be expedient for any man to speak thus of himself; except for some special purpose: but "the Spirit of God spake" by the psalmist; and it was proper that this high commendation of the Scriptures should stand on record, for the honour of God, and the instruction of mankind in all subsequent generations. (Note, 2 Tim. iii. 14-17.)

V. 101. (Notes, 57-63. 104. 128. i. 1-3. Jer. xiv. 10-12. Tit. ii. 11-14.)

V. 102. (Notes, 33.) 'Perseverance is the effect of instruction from above, by the Spirit through the word: and our heavenly teacher differeth from all others in this, that, with the lesson, he bestoweth on the scholar both a disposition to learn, and an ability to perform.' (Bp. Horne.) (Notes, 2 Sam. xxii. 21-23. Jer. xxxii. 39-41. Matt. xi. 23-30. John vi. 41-46.)

V. 103. 'The soul has its taste, as well as the body; and that taste is then in right order, when the words of Scripture are as sweet to the soul, as honey is to the mouth. If they are not always so, it is because our taste is vitiated by the world and the flesh.' (Bp. Horne.)

V. 104. A full and clear knowledge of the precepts of the Divine law, in their extent, spirituality, and excellence, is an introduction to a right understanding of the gospel, and indeed of the whole Scripture; it is the best preservative from heresies and delusions, almost all of which may be traced to errors or ignorance in this respect, and where the heart, as well as the mind, has learned the precepts of God, a holy taste, as well as a sound judgment, will be the sure effect: and every false and evil way will be hated and shunned. (Notes, xxvii. 10. Ex. xx. 1. Prov. viii. 13. Am. v. 14, 15.)

V. 'The word of God discovereth to us our errors; it sheweth us where we have lost our way, and how we may recover it again. If we take this lamp in our hand, it will not only point out our course in general, but also direct us in every step, and guide our feet into the way of peace and holiness.' (Bp. Horne.)—The metaphor is taken from a man walking on a dangerous road, in the dark, except as he sees by a lamp, or lantern, where to set his feet, step by step, as he proceeds; but taking heed to his way by this friendly light, he passes on safely, and even comfortably, where otherwise he must have fallen into mischief or destruction. Such is this world, and our passage through it; such is man without revelation, or with revelation and without faith; and such is the use faith makes of revelation. (Notes, xliii. 3. Prov. vi. 23. xvii. 16. Is. viii. 20. Matt. vi. 22, 23. Eph. v. 8-14. 2 Pet. i. 19-21.)

dominant corruption in our souls.—“Cleanse the thoughts of our hearts, by the inspiration of thy Holy Spirit,” &c. (Liturgy.)

V. 114—117. (Note, 106.) “He desireth God’s continual assistance, lest he should faint in this race which he had begun.”—The psalmist formed his purposes, under a consciousness of his weakness, and the power of temptation, and in dependence on the promises of God. V. 119. “Ungodly men and hypocrites are mingled among the servants of God, as dross is blended with the pure metal; but the fiery trial of divine judgments discovereth the difference.” These dispensations increase our love of God’s word: because they give us sensible experience of its truth.” (Horne.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 97—120. When grace is in lively exercise, the thirst and relish for “the sincere milk of the word” of God become exceedingly strong, and shew themselves by a daily and constant meditation on it, in all the intervals of needful business and conversation: and if the Lord has thus disposed our souls to love, study, and keep his truths, testimonies, and precepts; he will give us true wisdom.—The diligent believer will after a time “have the word of Christ dwelling richly and abundantly” in his memory, judgment, and affections; and, having it ever with him, he will be wiser than his most sagacious enemies; and able to discern, escape, or profit by, all their machinations, and even to baffle every temptation of his most subtle adversary the devil. (Matt. iv. P. O. 1—4. Eph. vi. 14—17. Col. iii. 16, 17.) Nay, the simplest Christian, who, by faith and prayer, appropriates the information conveyed to him in the Scriptures of truth, will soon surpass, in useful knowledge and practical wisdom, the most learned teachers, the most renowned fathers, and the most aged and experienced persons, who, “leaning to their own understandings,” reject, or are but superficially acquainted with, the oracles of God; for these are far surer guides to truth, than doctors, councils, or synods, ancient or modern. It will not indeed readily occur to the mind of a humble Christian, that he is thus wiser than his seniors and superiors; and he will suspect and fear the thought, when it presents itself: yet, daily reading his Bible, he must perceive how men deviate from that unerring standard of truth and wisdom, and run into error and delusion; he cannot, without ingratitude, deny what the Lord hath taught him; nor dares he, in an affected and “voluntary humility,” “call darkness light, and light darkness,” or prefer human conjectures to the decisions of the only wise God.—But, “who is a wise man, and endued with knowledge among us? Let him shew out of a good conversation his works with meekness of wisdom.” If the Lord hath indeed taught us, we refrain our feet from every evil way, that we may “keep his word;” nor shall we depart from his judgments all our days. Our souls relish the words of God, more than the mouth doth the sweetness of honey; and in proportion as, through his precepts, we get understanding, we shall hate and shun every way of sin and of hypocrisy. We do not use our knowledge ostentatiously, and to gain applause: but, knowing what a dark and perilous path we tread, and how important each of our steps is, to ourselves and to others, we use the word of God as a lamp, which we carry in our hands, that we may not stumble, be ensnared, or defiled; and that we may not only not quite miss our way, but may proceed uniformly with credit and comfort. Depending on the promised

V. 106. David had bound his soul with a most solemn vow, to live devoted to God, and obedient to his commandments. The preventing grace of God had inclined his heart to this; he doubtless depended on his continued help for ability to perform his vow: and the obedience, to which he thus bound himself, was that of a sinner under a dispensation of mercy, and of a believer who is interested in the covenant of grace. Such a solemn vow is implied in baptism, in bringing our children to be baptized, and in our attendance on the Lord’s table; and these public solemnities should be preceded by those secret transactions, betwixt God and our souls, in which we accept of his proffered benefits, and yield up ourselves to his service. (Notes, lvi. 12. cxvi. 13. 2 Chr. xv. 12—15. Neh. x. 29. Matt. xxi. 13—15. P. O.)

V. 107. (Marg. Ref. Notes, 25, 88.)

V. 108. Praise and thanksgiving, with other devotional exercises, are the free-will offerings of the mouth, which are acceptable to God through the sacrifice and mediation of Christ: and David, in his afflictions, could present no other oblations. (Notes, Num. xxix. 39. Hos. xiv. 1—3. Col. iii. 16, 17. Heb. xiii. 15, 16. 1 Pet. ii. 4—6.)

V. 109. David’s life was continually in danger, and he was required at all times to exert himself, and use the greatest precaution, in warding off the assaults of his persecutors; but he would not violate the law of God, even in order to self-preservation. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 111. By faith to receive the truths which God had attested, and to embrace the promises that he had given; and thus to walk with him in his commandments and ordinances, formed that life, which David deliberately chose to lead on earth, as introductory to his everlasting heritage in heaven: and the rejoicing of his soul in the exercise of faith, hope, love, and other pious affections, here below, was an earnest and pledge of those unalloyed pleasures, reserved for him in the future world. (Notes, 14—127. xix. 7—11. Josh. xxiv. 15. Luke x. 38—42. P. O. 38—42. 1 John v. 9—12.)

V. 112. “The inclination of the heart to good is the work of God; but man is, nevertheless, in this, as in other instances, said to perform it, when he listens to the call, and obeys the motions of his grace.—We are not to judge of ourselves by what we sometimes say and do: but by the general disposition and tendency of the heart and its affections.” (Bp. Horne.)

V. 113. The word vain is not in the original; and some render the verse, “I hate other thoughts; but thy law do I love.” (The original word scarcely occurs in this sense, elsewhere.) Those “thoughts,” however, which the psalmist hated, doubtless, were vain or evil, and so contrary to the law which he loved. “Love and hatred are the two great and influencing affections of the human mind. Since the fall they have been misplaced. By nature we love vain thoughts, and hate the law of God. “The carnal mind is enmity against God, is not subject to the law of God, neither indeed can be.” But in the renewed mind the case is altered; its “delight is in the law of God;” and therefore it cannot bear vain thoughts.” (Bp. Horne.)—In those vacant hours, which are spared from business, pleasure, company, and sleep, and which are spent in solitude, at home or abroad; unprofitable, proud, covetous, sensual, envious, or malicious imaginations, occupy the minds of ungodly men, and often infect their very dreams. These are not only sinful in themselves, indicating the state of their hearts, and as such will be brought into the account at the day of judgment; but they excite the dormant corruptions, and lead to more open and gross violations of the holy law. The carnal mind welcomes and delights to dwell upon these congenial imaginations, and to solace itself by ideal indulgences, when opportunity of other gratification is not presented, or when a man dares not venture on the actual transgression. But the spiritual mind recoils at them: such thoughts will intrude, but they are unwelcome and distressing, and are thrust out from time to time; whilst other subjects, from God’s word, are stored up in readiness to occupy the mind more profitably and pleasantly, during the hours of leisure and retirement.—There is no better test of our true character, than the habitual effect of “vain thoughts” upon our minds; whether we love and indulge them, or abhor and watch against them. And by enquiring to what subjects we habitually and allowedly revert, when present circumstances do not impose any one upon us, we may discover the prevalent disposition of our heart, whether we be carnal or spiritual; and may also learn whether pride, malice, avarice, ambition, or sensuality, be the pre-grace of God, the true Christian solemnly vows to "keep his righteous judgments," and he determines to perform his vows. He is often greatly afflicted, but it chiefly grieves him, that "he cannot do the things that he would;" and his longing desire, to become more holy, dictates his daily prayers for quickening grace. He offers the free-will offerings of his mouth, his grateful praises for former mercies, united with supplications for further instructions and assistance; and he depends only on mercy for the acceptance of his defective and defiled services. If we are indeed thus "led by the Spirit," neither enemies nor dangers will induce us to forget the law of our God, or to "wander from his precepts;" but we shall choose his testimonies as our eternal heritage, and find his service our present rejoicing, even in the midst of tribulation and persecution; and we shall bestow pains, as well as pray, that our hearts may be inclined to perform God's "statutes always, even unto the end." In proportion as we are thus spiritually-minded, we shall hate all sinful thoughts, and delight in heavenly meditations; and shall flee to the Lord as our hiding-place and shield, from the incursions of vain imaginations and satanical suggestions, as much as for protection from outward violence, hoping in his word for deliverance from them all. Would we make progress in thus keeping God's commandments, we must separate from evil-doers, and even drive them from our company, if they will intrude; unless we mean to sacrifice conscience to courtesy, which king David would not do. We must also rely entirely on the upholding of divine grace; or we shall never be safe, or able to have continual respect to all the Lord's statutes: but in this simplicity of intention and dependence, we shall be held up and live, and never be ashamed of our hope. Every affection of the soul must be engaged in keeping us steadfast in the ways of God. We must be allured by hope, and constrained by love, and even moved by fear. And it will be profitable for us, often and seriously to consider the contempt and misery, which are poured upon the wicked, and prepared for them; for assuredly they will be trodden down like mire, and put away like dross, or driven like chaff into unquenchable fire: and these reflections on the doom of hypocrites and apostates, will induce us to cleave more steadily in love to the testimonies of God. But if such subjects made David to exclaim, "My flesh trembleth for fear of thee, and I am afraid of thy judgments:" surely we, who fall so far below him in devout affections, should "fear, lest a promise being left us of entering into heavenly rest, any of us should seem to come short of it!" (Note, Heb. iv. 1, 2.)

NOTES.

V. 121, 122. Conscious of having adhered to justice and equity, even towards his persecutors, the psalmist appeals to God from their unrighteous decisions: and he prays that he may not be left in the hands of his proud oppressors; but that the Lord himself would become his surety.—"Put thyself between mine enemies and me, as if thou wert my pledge."—As a rich person, by becoming surety for a poor man, rescues him from oppression or imprisonment; so the Lord delivers his servants from their enemies, and from impending ruin, by undertaking their cause. Christ, our surety, having paid our debt and ransom, rescues us from merited condemnation, and engages for all the blessings of complete salvation to every true believer. (Note, Heb. vii. 20—22.)

V. 123. (Notes, 81, 82. lxix. 1—3. lxxxiv. 1, 2. cxliii. 6, 7.) "Thy just promise." (Old Version.)—"The word, which hath promised it, (salvation) is the word of truth, faithfulness, and righteousness; the attributes of God are engaged for its accomplishment, and "He cannot deny himself." (Horne.) The justice of God, in deciding between David and his unjust oppressors, according to his word, might also be intended. (Notes, 2 Thes. i. 5—10.)

V. 124, 125. "I am devoted to thy service, and designed by thee to a high employment, enlighten my understanding, therefore, that I may fully know my duty." (Bp. Patrick.)—These repeated petitions no doubt were recollected by Solomon, when he prayed to the same effect. (Note, 1 Kings iii. 5—14 P. O. 1—15.)

V. 126. They "make void the law of God," who deny its obligation and authority, who obscure or explain away its meaning, and who render it of no effect by their traditions, or by their lives. (Notes, Jer. viii. 8, 9. Mal. ii. 4—9. Matt. xv. 3—6. Rom. iii. 29—31.) When these evils become general, it is time for the Lord to take the matter in hand, and by his own power to silence infidels, profligates, pharisees, and antinomians, to stand up for the honour of his own word, and to maintain his own cause among men: for no other power can effect these purposes; and in such circumstances the whole honour will be given unto him. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 127. "As the wickedness of those increaseth, who "make void the Divine law;" the zeal and love of believers should increase in proportion, to stem the torrent: and this may be done, to a surprising degree, by a few persons who, after the example of the first Christians, can forsake all, to follow their Master; who have the sense and the courage to prefer truth, wisdom, holiness, and heaven, to falsehood, folly, sin, and the world; who can resolutely reject the glittering temptation, and say, without hypocrisy, to their God, "I love thy commandments above gold, yea, above fine gold." (Bp. Horne.) (Notes, 14. 72. 111.)

V. 128. "The more I consider them, the more I approve every one of them...and abhor all those base and dishonest ways, whereby others advance themselves to riches and honours." (Bp. Patrick.)—"The word here rendered "false," is the same, which before is translated, "of lying." The word for "way" is indeed different; but "the false way," in this verse, and "the way of lying," in the other, no doubt are entirely the same.

V. 129. The discoveries which the word of God makes of the mysteries of his nature, the perfections of his character, and the power of his works, and likewise of the invisible and eternal world, are suited to excite the highest wonder and astonishment. The harmony of the Divine attributes in the mystery of redemption; the way of a sinner's acceptance; and the method of speaking peace to his conscience, without giving the least encouragement to sin; the rule and example of obedience, and all the motives and obligations to it, are most worthy of our admiration, love, and gratitude: and it is owing entirely, either to the depravity of our hearts, or to the familiarity of our thoughts with these subjects, that we are no more affected by them.

V. 130. The words of God enter the soul when, being read or heard, they are understood, believed, stored up in the memory, and used to regulate the judgment and conduct. They then give a satisfactory light to the mind upon every subject on which they treat; and speedily communicate more useful knowledge upon the most important topics, to the simplest believer, than the acutest philosophers have been able to develop through successive generations. "The simple idiots, that submit themselves to God, have their eyes opened, and their minds illuminated, so soon as they begin to read God's word.—Thus will the Scriptures give to the simple, in a few days, an understanding in those matters, which philosophers for centuries sought in vain." (Bp. Horne.) (Notes, 105. xix. 7—11. xciii. 5. Prov. vi. 23. Is. vi. 20. Luke xxiv. 44—49. Acts xvi. 13—15. 2 Cor. iv. 4—6.)

V. 131. As the man who has run himself out of breath, opens his mouth to draw in the refreshing breeze, and eagerly pants for it, so the believer, wearied with the cares of life, and his conflict with sin, longs for the consolations conveyed to him by the sacred word, and stands expecting and prepared to receive them into his heart. (Notes, 19—21. 40. 81, 81. xlii. 1—3. Heb. xii. 14.)

V. 132. The love of the name or perfections of God, distinguishes the believer from all those who are carnally minded, and enmity to God; for nothing "availeth in Christ, but faith, which worketh by love."—The reconciled believer is dealt with according to the gospel of grace; the unregenerate and unbelieving according to the strict and holy law. This David understood, and prayed earnestly to be dealt with according to that gracious rule by which the Lord pardoned and recompensed his friends; not in that strict justice with which he punishes his enemies. (Notes, 124. xxv. 6, 7. cvi. 4, 5.)

V. 133. The frequent ejaculatory prayers for divine teaching and upholding, and that God would not permit any sin to acquire dominion over him, shew how much the psalmist understood and felt his entire dependence on God, not only for providential protection, and the forgiveness of his sins, but also as to those things in which men in general depend on themselves, and assume the credit of any real or supposed difference, subsisting between them and others; namely, the due exercise of their rational powers, and the right state of their hearts.—"O God, from whom all holy desires, all good counsels, and all just works, do proceed," &c. (Liturgy.)—It is evident that David deeply felt that

NOTES.

V. 145, 146. "He sheweth that all his affections and whole heart were bent to God's word, for to have help in his dangers."—The psalmist is also at least as earnest to be enabled to keep the commandments of God, as to be rescued from his sufferings. (Notes, 10. 106. lxii. 8-10. Eph. ii. 8-10. Tit. ii. 11-14.)

V. 147, 148. "David delighted in prayer and meditation; therefore he was beforehand with the light itself; therefore his eyes prevented the watches, that is, the last of those watches, into which the night was by the Jews divided. He needed not the watchman's call, but was stirring before it could be given. Climate and constitution will doubtless make a difference.—But by Christians who enjoy their health, the sun should not be suffered to shine in vain, &c. (Bp. Horne.) (Notes, Mark i. 35-39. P. O. 29-45. Luke vi. 12.)

V. 149. (Notes, 77. li. 1, 2.) Quicken, &c. "Give me life and animation in thy service; according to the wise and righteous appointments of thy word."

V. 150, 151. "If our enemies draw nigh to destroy us, God is still nearer to preserve us." (Bp. Horne.)—He is indeed near, in his providence; but we should with David, pray that he may be graciously near us, "to uphold our goings in his commandments," which are truth and righteousness; as well as to protect us against those, who "follow after mischief," and forsake his law.

V. 152. "This hath been my support, long before I fell into these troubles, that whatsoever thou hast testified to be thy will and pleasure is sure and steadfast, and shall never fail those that depend upon it." (Bp. Patrick.) (Notes, 42. 144.)

V. 154. The original word, translated "deliver," is taken from the office of a redeemer, or next of kin among the Israelites, to whom it belonged to redeem the inheritance, or ransom the person, of his impoverished or enslaved relative; and also to be his patron and defender against injustice and oppression; and the avenger of his blood, if he were slain. (Notes, Lev. xxv. 25-28. 47-55. Num. xxxv. 11-15. Ruth iv. 1-8. Marg. Ref.)

V. 155. "The salvation of God is nigh them that fear him;" for they seek to know and do the will of God: but, after all which has been done by the great Redeemer, or revealed and promised in Scripture, or vouchsafed by a kind Providence as "means of grace;" "salvation is far from the wicked," or impenitent, "for they seek not the statutes" of God.—Some explain the verse of temporal deliverance: "Far be it from thee to afford any help to the wicked; for they have no regard to thy statutes; but only seek how they may satisfy their own lewd and cruel desires." (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 157, 158. "Persecution tempteth men to apostasy, and is the great trial of our fidelity to God and to his word. He, who in such circumstances forgetteth his own sufferings, to commiserate the sin and folly of his persecutors, is a true follower of Jesus Christ." (Bp. Horne.)—The original word denotes disgust, as well as sorrow. Thus our Lord "looked round" on the Pharisees "with anger, being grieved for the hardness of their hearts." (Note, Mark iii. 1-5.)

V. 159. The frequent, though varied repetition of the ejaculatory prayer, "Quicken me according to thy word," &c., shews that the psalmist considered it as relating to objects of the highest importance. (Note, 25.) The preservation of his temporal life, deliverance from his deep distresses, the communication of spiritual, and preservation to eternal life; with animating, encouraging grace, and whatever was needful in order to his activity and vigour in obeying the commandments of God, amidst temptations, dangers, and sufferings, may be all considered as implied in the general term; and sometimes one, sometimes another, to have been especially intended, according to existing circumstances. (Marg. Ref.)

fallen Adam, of a Redeemer; or the first promise to Abraham concerning his posterity, was truth itself. (Note, Gen. xii. 1-3.)—All the righteous judgments of God, whether in the declarations of his word, or of the dispensations of his providence, concur in accomplishing that truth, and form a part in that great design, which shall surely be completed, and endure for ever.—"Since thou first promisedst, even to the end, all thy sayings are true." (Note, cxxxviii. 2.)

V. 161. Saul and his princes persecuted David most unjustly: but he so revered the word of God, that he would not retaliate, or avenge himself upon them; and thus he constrained Saul himself to say, "Thou art more righteous than I." (Notes, 23. 157. 158. 1 Sam. xxiv. 4-7. 16-22. xxvi. 5-12. John xv. 22-25. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 162. "I take far more delight in doing thy will, and in what thou hast promised to do for me, than in the completest victory over all my enemies, (Bp. Patrick.) (Notes, 14. 111. Prov. xvi. 19. Is. ix. 3.)

V. 163. (Notes, 29. 30. 97-100. 104. 128. Marg. Ref.)

V. 164. "That is, sundry times." (Notes, 47-53. xxxiv. 1, 2. lv. 17.)—"They who, like David, during a time of persecution, put their trust in God, and wait his decision of their cause, will always find reason to praise him seven times a day, or continually, for his just decrees and "righteous judgments," concerning them. (Bp. Horne.)

V. 165. "Amidst the storms and tempests of the world, there is a perfect calm in the breasts of those who not only do the will of God, but love to do it. They are at peace with God, by the blood of reconciliation; at peace with themselves, by the answer of a good conscience, and the subjection of those desires which war against the soul; at peace with all men, by the spirit of charity; and the whole creation is so at peace with them, that "all things work together for their good." No external troubles can rob them of this great peace; no offences, or stumbling-blocks, which are thrown in their way, by persecution or temptation, by the malice of enemies, or apostasy of friends, by anything they see, hear of, or feel, can detain, or divert them from their course. Heavenly love surmounts every obstacle, and runs with delight "the way of God's commandments." (Horne.) This beautiful note seems indeed rather to shew what would be the case, did we perfectly love the law of God; and were indwelling sin not only dethroned, but destroyed, than what is generally, or perhaps in any instance, attained in this world.—But love to the law of God is a sure proof of conversion, and is in ordinary cases attended by proportionable peace: all disturbance and disquietude arise from contrary sources; and all who love the law, shall be "kept by the power of God through faith unto salvation." Other professed Christians may be offended and fall away, but these never shall.

V. 166. "He sheweth that we must first have faith, before we can work and please God."—To hope, on scriptural grounds, for the salvation of God, and, in this hope, to obey his commandments, unreservedly and habitually, forms a sure pledge of eternal felicity, and a constant preparation for death and judgment.

V. 167, 168. (Notes, 5-8. 97. 111. Marg. Ref.) "The plea of having kept the Divine precepts, in the mouth of David, or any other believer, intended sincerity, not perfection, and is alleged as an evidence of grace, not as a claim of merit." (Bp. Horne.)

All, &c. "I have no respect unto men, but see thee always before my eyes, as the judge of my actions."

V. 169. Give, &c. God has promised in his word to give wisdom to those who ask him for it; and understanding, or wisdom, consists in having the mind enlightened, and the judgment formed, according to the truths and precepts of Scripture. This is the medium through which God gives, (and man must seek,) true knowledge and wisdom; and the standard by which he judges of them, and distinguishes the genuine from all counterfeits.

V. 171. "The word signifieth to pour forth continually. "My lips shall pour forth praise; for thou hast taught me thy statutes." This is more literal, and

174 I have <sup>1</sup>longed for thy salvation, O LORD; <sup>2</sup>and thy law is my delight.

V. 175. "My soul shall live, and praise thee, and thy judgments shall help me."—The judgments of God on his enemies, the fatherly corrections of his people, the counsels of his word, and the ordinances of his house, are all helpful to the believer's sanctification, through the influences of the Holy Spirit. (Notes, 50—53. 75. Rom. v. 3—5. viii. 28—31.)

V. 176. "It is doubtful, whether David here speaks of his misery or his sin, of his wandering as an exile, or going astray from the commandments of his God." (Bp. Horne.)—The simile, however, of a lost sheep is so generally applied to the latter case, and the language, thus interpreted, accords so to other parts of Scripture; that it is most probable his past sins, and his proneness to wander, were especially meant in this concluding confession and ejaculation. (Notes, Is. liii. 4—6. Matt. xviii. 12, 13. Luke xv. 3—7. John x. 14—18. 1 Pet. ii. 18—25.)—Perhaps it was written after he had gone so far astray in the matter of Bathsheba and Uriah; and, being deeply convinced of his guilt and misery, he felt his need of the special aid of the good Shepherd, to bring him back to the fold of God. (Marg. Ref.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 145—176. Supplications "with the whole heart" differ very widely from that lip-labour, in which formalists confide; and are presented by those alone who long for God's salvation, and who love his commandments, but are sensible of their inability to keep them.—Great earnestness in any undertaking often interrupts our sleep; thus fervent love to the word of God, and delight in communion with him, will render us willing to deduct from the hours of rest and refreshment, rather than be prevented from attending on these needful and pleasant exercises.—The Lord, indeed, hath not seen good to give us positive injunctions in these matters, and is accessible at all hours: yet we may often detect ourselves, as defective in love, gratitude, and spirituality, by our slothfulness and self-indulgence; seeing we have been needlessly asleep, or employed in trifles, when we might have been improving our privilege of access to the mercy-seat, and to that sacred word in which we profess to hope. This should lead us to call upon God to hear our voice, and quicken us, according to his love, his wisdom, and his truth.—When employed in the service of God, we need not fear, though "they should draw nigh who follow after mischief, and are far from his law," in their temper and conduct; for he is near to defend us, and will vindicate the honour of his commandments, against those who hate us for obeying them: and if we have depended on his testimonies; our constant experience will assure us, that he hath established them for ever. He considers the weight and the continuance of our afflictions, and will plead our cause and deliver us; as we do not forget this law, but are more desirous of being invigorated in his ways, than of exemption from trouble. But present safety, and everlasting salvation, are far from the wicked, who neither observe, nor understand, nor even seek after the truths and statutes of the Lord: and, alas! how numerous are these careless presumptuous transgressors!—The number, power, and malice of our persecutors should enhance our value for the tender mercies of God, and our steady purpose not to decline from his ways. And in this frame of mind, we shall rather grieve for the transgressors who are ruining themselves, than for the uneasiness which they occasion us.—Happy are they, who can appeal to God how cordially they love this law! His grace hath planted this love in their hearts; they are interested in all his precious promises, which from the beginning have been true and faithful; and they are brought into the way of those "righteous judgments," every one of which is immutable and endureth for ever.—When princes become persecutors, their frowns and menaces prove powerful temptations to apostasy, or iniquity; and desire of self-preservation may dictate very unwarrantable measures: but they whose "hearts stand in awe of God's word," will rather endure the wrath of man, than break the law of their almighty Judge, and will prefer suffering to deliverance by sin. (Notes, Jer. xxvi. 12—15. Dan. iii. 16—18, vi. 10, 11. Acts iv. 13—22.) Nay, were there no denunciations of wrath, on those that draw back for fear of the cross; their value for the promised blessings and consolations of the Scripture is so great, that they would not renounce them to save their lives, and to obtain all worldly advantages: for they rejoice in digging into those rich mines of everlasting truth and love, far more than their enemies can do in spoiling them of their earthly substance.—Our dread and detestation of hypocrisy, fraud, and dissimulation will be proportioned to our love of the truth and law of God: they therefore, who cheat, or impose on, their neighbours for their own gain, cannot really love the gospel.—The mercies of common providence, the righteous judgments recorded in Scripture, and the blessings conveyed to us by them, demand our constant tribute of praise; and were our hearts like that of David, we should not be so remiss and infrequent in this heavenly exercise: nor would even troubles and persecutions unfit us for it; seeing we have so many unmerited comforts, such glorious discoveries made to us, and such blessed prospects set before us, in our most trying circumstances.—The believer, "delighting in the law" of his reconciled God, enjoys great peace of conscience and tranquillity of mind, even in this turbulent and unsettled world; and the promises of God assure him, that he shall not meet with any stumbling-block, over which he shall fall to rise no more. He hopes for the free salvation of the gospel, and conscientiously obeys the holy commandments of the law: he keeps the testimonies of God, yea, loves them exceedingly; and attends on his worship, as one who knows, that "all his ways are before his eyes." Yet he will not rest in present attainments: he continues to cry unto his God for further instruction and sanctification, and for deliverance from his sins. Expecting the answer of his prayers, he determines that his lips shall render praises to his God. He knows that all his commandments are righteousness itself, and therefore he will speak of them to others; whilst he chooses them as the rule of his own conduct, and begs for help from the powerful hand of the Lord, that he may be enabled to obey them. He longs for more complete salvation, and delights in the service of God; and he would live on earth, and hopes to live in heaven for ever, that he may show forth his praises: nay, he values even afflictions, when they help him in following after holiness. He often looks back with shame and gratitude to his original lost estate, when, like a helpless sheep, he wandered from the fold of God, and was sought and brought back by the good Shepherd. He humbly confesses his manifold subsequent wanderings: but as he has not forgotten the commandments of God, he still prays to be sought out, and brought home, and kept safe, under the watchful eye and tender care of the chief Shepherd, who "purchased his flock with his own blood;" that he may know his voice, and follow him, and receive from him the gift of eternal life.—To close our meditations on this important psalm; let us examine our intentions, desires, fears, hopes, affections, experiences, and tempers, by it; that we may judge ourselves, whether we be led by the Spirit of Christ or not, and that we may discover what progress we make in the divine life. Let us frequently step aside from a vain world, to view ourselves in this sacred mirror; that we may discover and rectify what is wrong in our tempers and conduct, and be directed in our confessions, our watchfulness, and our prayers, by it: remembering always, that the more we advance in holiness, the more we shall anticipate the joys of heaven; and, as it were, breathe the pure air of those celestial regions, even while we continue in the noisome dungeon of this evil world.

NOTES.

PSALM CXX. Title. No satisfactory reason hath been assigned, why this and the fourteen following psalms are entitled "Songs of degrees." Some think it is denoted, that they were peculiarly suited to mount the soul from earth to heaven: but others suppose that this title only relates to the manner in which they were set to music, and sung at the temple.—This psalm seems to have been made by David, when the calumnies of Doeg and others forced him to flee his country. (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 1, 2. (Marg. Ref. Notes, xxxi. 17, 18. xxxv. 11, 12. lii. 2—4. Matt. xxvi. 57—62.)

V. 3. Or, "What shall a false tongue give to thee? And what shall it do to thee?"—What profit do you expect from this lying and slandering?"—"What fruit had ye in those things of which ye are now ashamed?" (Notes, Job xxvii. 7—10. Rom. vi. 21—23.)

V. 4. The intenseness and duration of the misery of those who slandered the servants of God, are represented by the vehement and lasting heat which the wood of the juniper-tree is said to yield, after it is reduced to charcoal; as well as by the sharp arrows of a mighty warrior, when he overtakes his enemy. Some, however, think that the slandering tongue is described under these images. "It is as the coals of juniper," &c. (Marg. Notes, lvii. 4. lix. 7. Prov. xii. 18, 19. Jam. iii. 3—12.)

V. 5. It is probable that David never actually resided in Mesech, or Kedar, (Arabia); but the conduct of Saul, and Doeg, and the Ziphites, was so treacherous and impious, that he seemed to be situated among the wild Arabs, who subsisted by war and violence. (Notes, Jer. ix. 1—6. xv. 10. Mic. vii. 1—4.) Some render the word Mesech, not as the name of a people, but adverbially—"Woe is me, that I sojourn so long in the tents of Kedar," &c.—Thus our Lord says, "How long shall I be with you? How long shall I suffer you?"

V. 7. I am, &c. Or, "I peace." David, though valiant in war, loved peace, and was very desirous of it; but his wise and blameless conduct only served to excite still more the envy and enmity of Saul and his courtiers. (Marg. Ref. Note, Rom. xii. 17—21.)

PSALM CXXII.

David expresses his joy at being excited by his companions to go up to the sanctuary, and extols the holy city, 1—5. He exhorts the people to pray for the peace of Jerusalem, and resolves to seek her good, 6—9.

*A Song of degrees of David.

I WAS glad when they said unto me, 'Let us go into the house of the LORD.

2 Our feet shall stand within thy gates, O Jerusalem.

3 Jerusalem is 'built as a city that is compact together:

4 Whither 'the tribes go up, the tribes of the LORD, unto 'the testimony of Israel, 'to give thanks unto the name of the LORD.

5 For 'there 'are set thrones of judgment, 'the thrones of the house of David.

6 'Pray for the peace of Jerusalem: 'they shall prosper that love thee.

7 'Peace be within thy walls, and prosperity 'within thy palaces.

8 For 'my brethren and companions' sakes, I will now say, Peace be within thee.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

During the believer's wearisome pilgrimage and perilous warfare, he should constantly look unto him who bled on mount Cavalry, and who now reigns upon the holy hill of Zion; in whom "we have righteousness and strength," through whom we have access to the mercy-seat and to JEHOVAH as our father, and by whom we shall ere long be received into everlasting mansions.—The helper and "keeper of Israel" is the almighty Creator of heaven and earth; and "if he be for us, who can be against us?" (Notes, Rom. viii. 28—39.) We should then enquire, whether we belong to this holy nation, this peculiar people. This being ascertained, we may dismiss our anxious cares and fears; or only be careful to use the appointed means, and be found in our proper work. (Notes, Matt. vi. 25—32. Phil. iv. 5—7.) The Lord will "uphold our goings in his ways, that our footsteps slip not." He "neither slumbereth nor sleepeth;" he will keep his people night and day, in dangers, snares, temptations, and persecutions; from open and secret enemies: he will preserve them from all real evil, and make all seeming evil work together for their good: he will protect their lives, during the appointed period, and order all the circumstances of their departure: he will preserve their souls, and take care of them in going out and coming in; when present with their bodies, and when separated, and when again united to them, from this time forth for evermore. (Notes, lxxxiv. 11, 12. 2 Cor. v. 5—8. Phil. i. 21—26. iii. 20, 21.) "Happy are the people that are in such a case; yea, blessed are the people, who have the LORD for their God."

NOTES.

PSALM CXXII. V. 1, 2. This psalm seems to have been written for the use of the Israelites, when they went up to Jerusalem to celebrate their sacred feasts, (after the ark was removed thither,) and to have communion with God and with their brethren. Their journey would often be inconvenient, wearisome, and expensive: but the holy joy and benefit, which thence accrued, would amply repay them. (Notes, lxxxiv. 4—10.)—Jerusalem was typical both of the church of true believers, and of the heavenly state; and the solemnities of Israel were like our public ordinances, acts of sacred worship, and, when attended on in faith and love, earnestness and foretastes of the worship and joy of heaven.—It may be supposed, that the psalmist greatly rejoiced, not only in anticipating the pleasure of attending on the ordinances of God, but also in perceiving the people, generally and zealously, disposed to the duties of religion. (Notes, xxvii. 4—6. xlii. 1—5. lxxiii. 1—6. lxxvi. 13, 14. xcv. 1—6. c. 4, 5. cxi. 17—19. cxxviii. 19—24. cxxxii. 7—10. Is. ii. 2—5. lxxvi. 19—23. Jer. i. 4—6. Mic. i. 1—5.)

V. 3—5. 'By the artificial joining and beauty of the houses, he meant the concord and love that were between the citizens.' (Notes, 1. z. xlv. 1—12. Gal. iv. 21—31. Eph. ii. 19—22. iv. 1—7. 11—13. Rev. xxi. 10—27.)—Jerusalem, from the time of David, was considered as the centre of the worship and government of Israel, and as the bond of union among the tribes: and whilst that city remained compact and united, as their common head, they were safe and prosperous. The union also of the priesthood in Aaron's family, with the kingdom in that of David, was very advantageous to their common interests, civil and religious; when justice was administered according to the law of God, and regal authority protected and supported the worship of God at his temple.—This typified the union of the priesthood and kingdom in the person of the Redeemer. (Notes, Zech. vi. 12, 13. Heb. viii. 1—3.)—David's sons were "chief rulers," soon after the removal of the ark to mount Zion; (2 Sam. viii. 18.) so that the thrones of his family, as well as his own throne, were then established at Jerusalem.—Testimony, (4.) (Ex. xxvi. 10—21.)

V. 6, 7. 'The members of the Israelitish church are exhorted to pray for its peace and welfare: what that church was, the christian church militant on earth now is, and demandeth in like manner the prayers of all christian people, for its peace and welfare in a troublesome world. Its increase here below is,

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Whilst we look, not to David only, but to Jesus "the Prince of peace;" and see him surrounded by ensnaring cavillers, and calumniated by lying lips and deceitful tongues; whilst we consider how long the holy Saviour sojourned in this wicked world, "as in Mesec and in the tents of Kedar:" whilst we attend to his blameless useful life, and the great object of his coming into the world, namely, "to make and give peace by the blood of his cross;" and then view him hated, reviled, and persecuted even to death, by the professed worshippers of God: we cannot marvel, if the world hate and slander us too. We shall not court the friendship of those who would wage war with the Son of God himself, if he were on earth; and, though uneasy, we ought not to murmur at being for a time constrained to dwell amidst the contentious and malicious. But let us follow David, as he prefigured Christ: in our distress let us "cry unto the LORD, and he will hear us;" and deliver our persons and reputations from lying lips, and every deceitful tongue. Let us possess our souls in patience, and follow after peace and holiness, and strive to overcome evil with good. Then, after our weary pilgrimage shall expire, we shall enter a land of eternal harmony, purity, and tranquillity. And as we must foresee the dreadful misery of all impenitent slanderers and liars in the everlasting fire of hell, let us in meekness warn them of their danger, "if peradventure God will give them repentance, to the acknowledging of the truth; and that they may recover themselves out of the snare of the devil, who are taken captive by him at his will." (Note, 2 Tim. ii. 23—26.)

NOTES.

PSALM CXXI. V. 1, 2. Some read the first verse as an interrogation, "Shall I lift up," &c. as if the psalmist had enquired whether it became him, as a worshipper of God, to look up to those hills for help, on which idolaters worshipped their idols. But the sentence, as it stands in our version, may mean, that he would look up to the hills of Zion, or Moriah, on which the tabernacle was placed, for help from that God, whose glory appeared above the mercy-seat.—If David was the writer of this psalm, (as it is most probable,) it must relate to other dangers and difficulties, and not to those of his persecutions by Saul; for the hill of Zion was not in Israel's possession, nor was the ark placed there, till after Saul's death. (Notes, 2 Sam. v. 6—9. vi. 12, 13.)—'Though I am driven, not only from my own palace, but from God's dwelling-place; yet my eyes shall ever be directed thitherward; from whence I expect a powerful aid, against those numerous enemies who are combined to destroy me.' (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 3, 4. (Notes, xvi. 8—11. xxxvii. 23, 24. 1 Sam. ii. 9. Prov. iii. 23—25. Marg. Ref.) 'Bishop Lowth supposed the first two verses to be the language of David, when going out to war; and the answer of encouragement to be made by the high priest from the holy place.' (Bp. Horne.)—If, however, the psalm was written when David was driven away from Zion by Absalom, this could not be; yet, it seems to have been composed, in order to be sung responsively; and these verses form the response to the preceding avowal of confidence in God.—'In him thou hast a guardian, who is not like all others, by being liable to sleep or death.—The eye of his providence upon thee is always open.'—'Behold, He that keepeth Israel neither slumbereth nor sleepeth.' (Notes, xlv. 23—26. 1 Kings xviii. 27—29.)

V. 5—8. As the pillar of cloud and fire shaded Israel in the wilderness, from the scorching noon-day sun, and from the chilling cold and unwholesome influences of the night, over which the moon presides; (Gen. xxxi. 40:) so the Lord shelters his people from every open assault, and every insidious attempt of persecutors, seducers, or the powers of darkness. (Notes, Ex. xiii. 21. 22. Num. x. 33, 34. Matt. vi. 13. 2 Tim. iv. 16—18.)

'Nor scorching sun, nor sickly moon,
'Shall have his leave to smite;
'He shields thy head from burning noon,
'From blasting damps at night.—
'He guards thy soul, he keeps thy breath,
'Where thickest dangers come;
'Go and return, secure from death
'Till God shall call thee home.'

(Watts.)

9 Because of the house of the LORD our God,
I will seek thy good.

PSALM CXXIII.

and complains of the contempt of the proud, 1—4.

PSALM CXXIV.

Israel blesseth God for marvellous deliverances, and exults in his protection,

*A Song of degrees of David.

IF it had not been the LORD who was on our side,
now may Israel say;

2 If it had not been the LORD who was on our side, when men rose up against us:

3 Then they had swallowed us up quick, when their wrath was kindled against us:

4 Then the waters had overwhelmed us, the stream had gone over our soul:

5 Then the proud waters had gone over our soul.

6 Blessed be the LORD, who hath not given us as a prey to their teeth.

7 Our soul is escaped as a bird out of the snare of the fowlers; the snare is broken, and we are escaped.

8 Our help is in the name of the LORD, who made heaven and earth.

in reality, the increase of the Jerusalem above, of which it is a part, and ought to be a resemblance.' (Bp. Horne.) — 'Happy shall they be, who from regard to the religion and justice administered in thee, O beloved city, contribute their endeavours, as well as prayers, for thy safety and prosperity.' (Bp. Patrick.)
(Notes, li. 18, 19. cxxxvii. 1—6. Gen. xii. 1—3. Marg. Ref.)

V. 8, 9. The psalmist concludes, by declaring his full purpose of using his authority and influence, for the benefit of the holy city, from love to his brethren and his pious friends, but especially from love to God and his sacred service.
(Notes, 1 Chr. xxix. 3—19. Marg. Ref.) Thus he gave all rulers, through succeeding generations, an example, in what manner to improve their talents, in promoting true religion among their subjects, without at all infringing on the rights of conscience. (Notes, 2 Chr. xxx. 12. Is. xlix. 22, 23. Ez. xlv. P.O.
1—15.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The servants of God should exhort, and be glad to be exhorted, to attend on his ordinances. Indeed they, who love his name and seek his salvation, will "rejoice when it is said unto them, Let us go into the house of the LORD;" and the pleasure and profit, which they derive from 'the means of grace,' will make them disregard inconvenience and fatigue in resorting thither. With what alacrity then should we think of going to the temple above, when our feet shall stand within the gates of the heavenly Jerusalem! and how cheerfully should we bear the cross, and welcome the stroke of death, in hopes of that immortal crown of glory! — Union and harmony are the ornament and stability of the church on earth: and if all the disciples of Christ were of one mind, and "endeavoured to keep the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace," their enemies would be deprived of their chief advantage against them. (Notes, Eph.
iv. 1—7.) And if they were all more attentive to the commands, and submissive to the authority, of the Son of David, and referred their causes to his decision; they would be more like "the tribes of Israel," even the "tribes of the LORD," when they went up to the testimony of Israel, (the ark of the covenant and the mercy-seat,) "to give thanks unto the name of the LORD." But Satan's maxim has always been, to divide that he might conquer: and few Christians have been sufficiently aware of his design. Let all then, who love the cause of pure religion, "pray for the peace," in order to the prosperity, of the church.
Let us consider every one, who bears the image and seeks the glory of the Redeemer, as our brother, our companion, our fellow-traveller, and our fellow-soldier; without greatly regarding unessential differences or secular distinctions.
Let us seek the peace and comfort of every true believer, the union and harmony of Christians among themselves, the security of the church against the assaults and devices of the common enemy, and the prosperity of all, whether in palaces or cottages, who use their influence and abilities to promote the cause of Christ, from love to his name. Let us, from zeal for the honour of our God, and good-will to all our brethren, and delight in the ordinances of his house, seek to do good to every part of his church, by our prayers and example, and by every means in our power: and, whilst we lament the abuses and divisions which prevail in the church on earth, let us solace ourselves with the foresight of the perfect harmony and tranquillity of the church in heaven; for perfect "peace will for ever be within her walls, and prosperity within her palaces."

NOTES.

PSALM CXXIII. V. 1. Some think that this psalm was composed for the use of the church, during the Babylonish captivity, or when persecuted by Antiochus Epiphanes: but others suppose it to have been written by Isaiah, on occasion of the scoffing boasts and menaces of Sennacherib and Rabshakeh;
while others are of opinion that David wrote it during Absalom's rebellion.
(Notes, xi. 4, 5. cxv. 3—7. cxxi. i. 2. Is. lvii. 15, 16. Matt. vi. 9.)

V. 2. 'Behold, we wait on thee, submitting ourselves to this severe punishment, as poor slaves to the stroke of their offended master or mistress; and resolving to bear it patiently, till thou in much pity remove it.' (Bp. Patrick.)
— The expectation of deliverance from God under the injuries of men; as faithful servants depend on their masters for redress and protection, seems more especially meant. (Notes, cxvi. 16. Josh. ix. 25—27. x. 1—6.)

V. 3, 4. These verses represent the psalmist, and those in whose name he speaks, as living on scorn and contempt, (even as a man lives on his daily provisions,) till they were satiated with them, and knew not how to endure any more; yet still exposed to the insulting scoffs and taunts of their prosperous and haughty oppressors: but in this extremity they humbly sought mercy from God, to pardon their sins, and to comfort them under the cruel treatment of their enemies; and they renounced all other hope of support and deliverance.

(Notes, xlv. 9—16. lxxiii. 5—9. lxxxix. 50, 51. cxix. 50—53. Neh. ix. 4, 5.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Our merciful God, from his throne in the heavens, (that high, holy, and glorious palace, where he displays his more immediate presence,) looks down to behold the affairs of men, and hear the prayers of his afflicted people; being able and ready to redress their grievances, whenever they look up to him for help and deliverance. If then we are become his servants, by faith in Jesus Christ; if we rely on his mercy, observe his directions, and expect our recompense from him, and not from man; we may also confidently look to him as our Master, to provide for, comfort, and defend us; and he will certainly require it of all those, who interrupt or injure us, whilst employed in his work. Being thus observant of his hand, and waiting for mercy; we need not be disconcerted, if we meet with scorn and insults from the pampered worldling, or the proud infidel, from the sensual, self-indulgent, and prosperous sons of rebellion and impiety. Indeed, contempt is very hard to bear: but the servants of God should not complain, if they are treated as his beloved Son was; and they cannot be more filled than he was with "the scorning of those that are at ease, and the contempt of the proud." Let us then, when ready to faint under this trial, look unto Jesus, copy his meekness and patience, and by faith and prayer cast ourselves upon the mercy of our God. (Notes, Heb. xii.
1—3.) Ere long the proud and luxurious scorner will be "filled with his own devices;" and the despised believer inherit the throne of glory.

NOTES.

PSALM CXXIV. V. 1—3. The title ascribes this psalm to David; so that, abiding by this authority, we must look for the occasion of it in the history of that prince; though it is not easy to determine the particular deliverance to which it refers.—It may, however, be applied to any season of special danger or distress to the church, or believers, from which they have been beyond expectation rescued.—Had Israel's helper been any other than the almighty and everlasting God; their numerous, powerful, and furious enemies must at once have destroyed them; as a voracious beast, or bird of prey, or sea-monster, swallows alive the helpless animal which falls in its way.—Israel had no power to deliver himself; and all other help, but that of God, must have been ineffectual.—This seems peculiarly suited to Hezekiah's deliverance from Sennacherib; to which some learned men, notwithstanding the title, suppose the psalm to refer. (Notes, 2 Kings xix.) Indeed it would equally suit Israel's deliverance from Pharaoh and his army. (Notes, Ex. xiv. xv. (Marg. Ref.))

V. 4—8. Overwhelming torrents, or the furious waves of the stormy sea; (Notes, xlii. 6—8. Is. viii. 6—8. Rev. xii. 13—17;) the voracious jaws of lions, tigers, or wolves; and the craft and skill of the fowler, in deceiving and ensnaring the poor unsuspecting bird, form three striking illustrations of the danger to which the people of God had been exposed, from their fierce, violent, and deceitful enemies. Yet God had wonderfully delivered them; and they were filled with admiring gratitude, when they recollected the extreme danger to which they had been exposed, and found themselves brought into a secure and happy situation. (Note, 2 Tim. ii. 23—26. Marg. Ref.) And as God had helped them, they were determined to confide in future in his protection alone.
(Notes, xlv. 5—7. cxlvi. 3—6.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The church of God, in every age, has been opposed by numbers of powerful, enraged, and cruel enemies: fierce persecutions, bloody wars and massacres, and wide-spreading destructive heresies, have alternately threatened to swallow her up; as the furious billows were ready to overwhelm the feeble bark in which Jesus was asleep. But, notwithstanding the machinations of hell, in aid of the efforts of human malice and power, the despised cause of Christ still maintains its ground: "the proud waters" have not yet overwhelmed and swallowed her up. "Blessed be the LORD, who hath not given her up as a prey unto the teeth" of her furious enemies. But, recollecting her dangers and helplessness, well may she say, "If it had not been the LORD, who was on our side, we should have been swallowed up quick, when men," when the powers of darkness, "were so enraged at us."—The believer also, recollecting his perilous situation, previous to his conversion, and the surprising manner in which he hath been rescued, the dangers from which he hath often narrowly escaped, and the difficulties from which he hath been extricated, notwithstanding his own ignorance, folly, and feebleness, will readily make the same thankful acknowledgment, and ascribe all the honour of his salvation to the power, mercy, and truth of Israel's God. He will consider himself as a shipwrecked mariner, marvelously saved from the tumultuous waves; as a poor lamb snatched from the jaws of the greedy wolf; or as the helpless bird set at liberty from the fowler's snare, in which it had heedlessly got entangled. Ere long every true Christian, being finally delivered from troubles, enemies, sins, and dangers, will look back on the way, in which the Lord hath led him, with admiring gratitude, and celebrate his mercy and truth in eternal songs of praise. Let us then now begin to praise him for the past, if indeed Satan's "snare be broken, and we be delivered;" and let us rejoice that our help for the time to come, "is in the name of the LORD, who made heaven and earth."

NOTES.

PSALM CXXV. V. 1. It does not clearly appear on what occasion, or by whom, this psalm was written: some, however, consider it, as referring to the invasion of Judah by Sennacherib, and the miraculous deliverance granted to Jerusalem, in answer to the prayers of Hezekiah and Isaiah. (Notes, 2 Kings xix. Marg. Ref.)—The security of the church implies the security of every true member of it. (Notes, cxxiii. 5-8. Matt. xvi. 18.)

V. 2. "Jerusalem! The mountains are round about her! And the LORD is round about his people from henceforth for evermore." This is a literal translation. The surrounding mountains only seemed to render the holy city impregnable: (Notes, Lam. iv. 12. Zech. ii. 1-5:) but the power of the almighty God effectually secures his true people. (Notes, Rom. vii. 28-39.)

V. 3. The persecuting rage and power of the wicked fall upon the righteous, but they do not "rest upon them," or prevent them from possessing and enjoying their allotted inheritance. (Marg. Ref.) Persecutions and oppressions, as well as other afflictive dispensations, are permitted, moderated, and sanctified, for their trial, correction, and spiritual proficiency; but if augmented and continued according to the desire of their enemies; they might become a too powerful temptation, and at length induce them to put forth their hands unto iniquity. (Notes, lxxvi. 10. Matt. xxiv. 21, 22. 1 Cor. x. 13, 14.)

V. 4, 5. Uprightness before God, and kindness to men, characterize true believers, for whom the psalmist here prays.—The way of holiness is straight; there are no windings or shiftings in it; it is an uniform course of piety, integrity, sincerity, and kindness. But the ways of sinners are crooked; they shift from one pursuit to another, and turn hither and thither to deceive; they wind about a thousand ways, to conceal their base intentions, to accomplish their iniquitous projects, or to escape the punishment of their crimes; yet, disappointment, detection, confusion, and misery, are their inevitable portion. (Notes, Is. lix. 3-8. Heb. xii. 12, 13. Marg. Ref.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The people of God trust in his mercy, truth, and power, and keep his commandments: they copy his example of goodness; and, with all their defects, are upright in their hearts. Their hopes and their souls are built upon that tried and precious foundation, which God hath laid in Zion; on which the whole church is founded, and which "cannot be removed, but abideth for ever," (Notes, Matt. xvi. 18. Eph. ii. 19-22;) yea, the Lord himself is with them, and a protection round about them, "from henceforth even for ever." Their dread of sin, and of apostasy, and their prayers to be kept from them, though by suffering or death, are the evidences that they shall not apostatize: for the Lord will proportion their strength to their trials, and make "all things work together for their good;" the malice and enmity of the wicked shall only prove a correcting rod, and not a destroying sword; even this rod shall not "rest

NOTES.

PSALM CXXVI. V. 1-3. This psalm is generally thought to have been composed when the Jews were restored to their own land, after the Babylonish captivity. Their restoration was effected in so sudden and extraordinary a manner, and was so delightful to them, that it seemed more like a pleasant dream than a reality. (Notes, xiv. 7. cvi. 47, 48. Ezra i. 1-6. iii. 12, 13. Job xlii. 10-17. Is. xxix. 7, 8. Jer. xxxi. 8-14. Luke xxiv. 36-43. Acts xii. 5-17.) Even the heathen noted the hand of God in their deliverance, and allowed that he had done great things for them; in which sentiment the people thankfully concurred. (Notes, Ez. x. 14-16. Num. xxiii. 23. Josh. ii. 8-16. ix. 8-11. 1 Kings viii. 41-43. 2 Kings xix. 19. Neh. vi. 15, 16. Jer. xl. 2, 3. Dan. iii. 26, 27. vi. 25-28. Zech. viii. 20-23. Marg. Ref.)—The whole event was typical of the spiritual redemption of the church, and of every believer, from the bondage of sin and Satan; and the word of God predicts a deliverance of the new-testament church from her long-continued captivity, which will occasion still greater surprise and exultation. (Is. xl. 1, 2. xlii. 14-21. lxi. 1-3. Rev. xi. 12-18. xviii. xix.)

V. 4. The torrent, or brooks, in the southern deserts run off, or dry up, in the summer months; but after the periodical rains they return again, and the channels are filled for the refreshment of the thirsty traveller: thus the Jews who were settled in their own country, prayed that their brethren might be brought back to replenish the land, which had lain so many years desolate. (Note, Job vi. 15-23.)

V. 5, 6. The tears with which the poor captives at Babylon had accompanied their repentance and prayers; the grief with which on their return they beheld, and attempted to repair, the desolations of their city and temple; and all the hardships which they endured in that pious attempt, would surely issue in joy and praise. As the poor husbandman, who perhaps wants his seed-corn to feed his family; and cannot part with it, and witness their hunger, without tears, and who with great labour and anxiety sows his good seed; will in due time rejoice in reaping and conveying home a plenteous harvest. "In going forth he shall go forth, and with weeping; carrying the dear-bought seed: coming, he shall come again, with shouting, carrying his sheaves." (Note, Gen. xlvii. 23-26. Is. xvi. 8-11.) The same is applicable to all the sorrows of the true Christian. (Notes, Is. xli. 1-3. Jer. xxxi. 8-14. 1. 4-6. Joel ii. 12-27. Matt. v. 4. John xvi. 16-22. 2 Cor. vii. 9-11. 2 Tim. ii. 3-5.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The hand of God should be acknowledged in our mercies, whoever be the instrument of them; and if unexpected deliverance from outward captivity be so valued, and rejoiced in, how ought we to value redemption from the wrath to come, and from the power of sin and Satan! The poor trembling sinner, being deeply convinced of his guilt and danger, having long sought and waited, perhaps with discouragement, for peace and liberty: when, by looking to a crucified Saviour, he is freed from his burden, and receives peace to his conscience, and power to break off his sins; reviews the misery which he has escaped, the price and method of his rescue, and the prospect which opens to him, and can often scarcely believe his happiness a reality. The phantoms of dream, or the sportive illusions of the waking imagination, could never present to his mind aught so welcome, as he now by faith perceives, and by grace experiences. Thus "is his mouth filled with laughter, and his tongue with singing;" and if his future conduct correspond to this happy beginning, even the ungodly will be constrained to own, that "The LORD hath done great things for him." With what exultation then will the redeemed sinner rejoice, "the LORD hath done great things for me, whereof I am glad!" Yet, still he hath to struggle with many temptations, corruptions, and afflictions: he will seek, and not in vain, for renewed and more complete deliverance; he will often on earth renew his songs of grateful praise; but, when at last, redeemed from death, he shall stand complete before the throne of glory, he will present his perfect praises with unalloyed rejoicing. We should not then be reluctant to sow in tears, whilst we remain in this world of sorrow. When we mourn for our sins, or sympathize with the afflicted, or suffer for Christ's sake, or endure chastisements, we are "sowing in tears to reap in joy." (Notes, Heb. xii. 5—13. 1 Pet. i. 6—8. Rev. vii. 13—17.) But let us be sure to sow good seed, to be thus watered with our tears; exercising repentance, faith, love, and patience, continuing instant in prayer, and in the use of every means of grace; and being unwearied in every good work, though we should meet ingratitude and discouragement from all quarters: then we shall "doubtless come again with joy, bringing our sheaves with us," for none of our labours, sorrows, or prayers will be lost; and if others are not profited by them, they will return into our own bosom, and augment our gracious and eternal reward. But, whether we rejoice in present comforts, or solace ourselves under sorrows, in hope of this glorious event, let us not forget our brethren in tribulation; but, let us pray for the support of every suffering saint, and for the deliverance of the church from oppression, from the defilement of heresy and iniquity, and from the debilitating effect of division. (Note, cxvii. 6—9. P. O.)—Let sinners also recollect, how dreadful their case will be, if they have all their little joy in this mourning world, and nothing hereafter but weeping, wailing, and gnashing of teeth; and let us all remember, that "God is not mocked; for whatsoever a man soweth, that also shall he reap." (Note, Gal. vi. 6—10.)

NOTES.

PSALM CXXVII. Title. It is probable that Solomon composed this psalm, when he succeeded to the throne of Israel, and was about to build the temple; for the same particle is used, which is elsewhere translated of. (Marg.) "A song of degrees, or psalm of Solomon;" or, a most excellent song of Solomon. (Note, 1 Kings iv. 30—34. Cant. i. 1.)

V. 1. The duty of constantly and entirely depending on God in every undertaking, is here inculcated. The psalmist did not mean that diligence, vigilance, and skill, ought not to be employed; but that God should be depended on, or they would be employed in vain.—"Paul may plant, and Apollos water; but God alone giveth the increase." (Note, 1 Cor. iii. 4—9. Marg. Ref.)—This was very applicable to Solomon's undertaking of building the temple, and preserving the holy city in peace and safety. (Notes, Zech. iv. 4—10.)

V. 2. Whilst others perplex themselves with fruitless cares, and incessant labours, about their worldly pursuits, often to no purpose; God, in the way of reliance on him, giveth sleep to his beloved: he enables them to do their duty cheerfully, and to leave the event with him in the confidence of faith, and thus to close their eyes in sleep without useless solicitude. (Marg. Ref.)—Beloved: singular, Jedido. (Note, 2 Sam. xii. 24, 25.)

V. 3—5. When worldly men are eagerly pursuing their temporal interests, they commonly profess that they only mean to provide for their families after them. But it entirely depends on the Lord, whether they shall have any children or not, or whether their children shall live with them, and survive them, or whether they will be a comfort, or a grief, to them. (Notes, Ec. ii. 18—23.) They, however, who trust in God, and walk in his ways, may hope to be comforted in their children: receiving them as a heritage from him, and bringing them up in his fear; they may expect, and will not generally be disappointed, that, as they defended their offspring in helpless infancy, so these will be their defence and ornament in the decline of life. "Such children shall be able to stop their adversaries' mouths, when their godly life is maliciously accused."—In a house full of dutiful children consisteth the happiness of their parents, who then can never want friends; friends that will at no time be ashamed; but will at all times rejoice to appear for them to meet their enemies and accusers in the gate, or place of judgment, there to answer any charge against them, to vindicate them in their persons, their good name, or their property. It is a glorious sight to behold children thus standing forth in defence of their parents.—It is a Chinese proverb, that, When a son is born into a family, a bow and arrow are hung before the gate. (Bp. Horne.)—Parents in general are apt, like Jacob, to be most attached to the children of their old age: but "the sons of their youth" must be their champions and defenders, and their good conduct reflects most honour on the parents who brought them up.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Whether we build, or plant, or defend our habitations and property; or, even attempt any good work for the house and city of our God: we should remember that our labour and watching will be in vain, except the Lord build, and plant, and watch with us. We should therefore diligently use the proper means, and then expect and pray for his blessing; that we may trust in him without presumption. Thus the minister, in his labours and watchings for the good of souls; thus the Christian in seeking to grow in grace, and to guard against temptation; and thus the sinner in coming to the Saviour, should use all appointed means with persevering application; and yet rely on the Lord alone to render them effectual. This is the method of being safe, comfortable, and successful. For want of attending to this rule, many labour and watch to no purpose. In vain they "rise early, sit up late, eat the bread of sorrows," and "bereave their souls of God," to provide for themselves and families: whereas "seeking first the kingdom of God, and his righteousness," using moderate diligence in their lawful callings, and casting all their care on God, they would have all needful success, without solicitude and vexation.—But if we enjoy either outward sleep, or inward tranquillity, we should give God thanks for it; and we ought never to forget that the rest, the peace, and the provision, which he giveth to his beloved, are far preferable to the much greater prosperity of the wicked.—It ill becomes the professed servants of God to murmur, because children are withheld; but far worse, to fret because they have a numerous offspring. Children are in Scripture considered as a heritage, and a reward from God to his people; and shall we deem them our encumbrance? as if he could not provide for many as well as for a few! When trained up according to his word, they generally prove the best defence, ornament, and comfort in declining years, if parents and children are spared to each other: and they are the seed of the church, and often prove the support of religion after the decease of their parents. Children also should remember their obligations to their parents; and study to requite them, by being ready to supply their wants, to vindicate their characters, and to protect them from oppression, in their old age. In this case they would be as arrows in the hand of the mighty man; and happy will he be who has his quiver full of them; he need neither be ashamed, nor afraid, to meet his enemies in the gate. Yet all earthly comforts are precarious; but the Lord will assuredly comfort and bless those who trust and serve him: and they, who zealously seek the conversion of sinners, will assuredly find their spiritual children to be their joy and crown, in the day of Jesus Christ. May all his ministers receive, abundantly, "this heritage and gift, that cometh of the LORD!"

NOTES.

PSALM CXXVIII. V. 1. 'Some think this was a form prescribed to be used at the blessing of their marriages; when they wished the new married couple all manner of happiness; especially a long life in peaceable times.' (Sp. Patrick.) It is probable, that this opinion occasioned the insertion of the psalm, in 'the form for the solemnization of matrimony,' in our church.—No blessing can warrantably be expected in any situation of life, except by those who "fear God and walk in his ways;" and they will be blessed in every station.

V. 2. 'The world esteemeth them happy which live in wealth and idleness: but the Holy Ghost approveth them best, that live on the mean profit of their labours.'

V. 3, 4. The opinion, above mentioned, illustrates the propriety of the blessedness secured to a pious man, being here viewed with a special respect to the comforts of the married state; for on that supposition newly married persons are exclusively addressed. Yet it is worth while for those who, either from supposed religious motives, or from an idea that wives and children hinder men's interest or comfort, are averse to marriage, either in their own case, or that of others, to consider this verse, in which a faithful wife and a flourishing offspring are by the Spirit of inspiration considered as most valuable blessings; and some of the most beautiful images in nature are employed by the Holy Spirit, to shew what a solace, and ornament, and comfort, they are to those who fear God. Would such language have been suggested to the inspired writers, if marriage had been a less holy, or less happy, state than celibacy?—It is observable, that Solomon, who, as some think, wrote this psalm, and who multiplied wives vastly beyond all that preceded him, here speaks of one wife, and no more, as a blessing to a pious man. Polygamy, though connived at, does not seem, even then, to have been general; and certainly it is unnatural, and contrary to domestic comfort.

5 The LORD shall 'bless thee out of Zion: and thou shalt see the good of Jerusalem all the days of thy life.

6 Yea, 'thou shalt see thy children's children, and 'peace upon Israel.

V. 5, 6. Whatever may be the dispensations of Providence towards believers; (for general rules always admit exceptions, and the preceding verse should be considered as a general rule, not as an express promise;) yet, they shall be blessed out of Zion, "with all spiritual blessings in heavenly things in Christ Jesus."—The concluding part of these verses seems to be made difficult in the application of it, by being translated in the future tense, and not in the imperative, or optative mood, according to the original. "The LORD shall bless thee out of Zion: and, mayest thou see the good of Jerusalem all thy days; yea, mayest thou see thy children's children, and peace upon Israel." Or, "Look thou for the peace of," &c. (Notes, li. 18, 19. cxviii. 6—9. P. O.) It cannot be supposed, that every pious man shall see prosperous times and a flourishing family; and live to old age. But such a wish, or prayer, or exhortation, was perfectly suited to the occasion.—'Mayest thou be so happy as to see Jerusalem the seat of justice and religion, in a flourishing condition all thy life long....And—to such a good old age, as to see thy children's children, and the whole nation all the while in a prosperous tranquillity.' (Bp. Patrick.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

They, who "fear God and walk in his ways" are the only happy persons, whatever their station in life may be. Nor will their comfort be diminished, if they labour hard in any honest calling for the subsistence of themselves and families; and if they have only the necessities, without any of the luxuries, of life. Indeed their happiness does not consist in relative comforts; and many of them, having all things in God, seek not wives and children, or are resigned, if bereft of them: yet religion, whilst it teaches the duties of every relation in life, best ensures the comfort of each. Marriage is peculiarly honourable and blessed to him, who enters it in the fear of God, and desires to walk with his family according to his will: and he may expect that his wife will be "as a fruitful vine, by the sides of his house, and his children as olive-branches round about his table." But the Lord "will bless his people out of Zion:" they shall see and taste of the blessings of his church, all the days of their life: and whether they be spared, like old Israel, to see their children's children, and the church in prosperity on earth, or not; they shall certainly share the peace of the heavenly Jerusalem, and bequeath the blessing of God as a legacy to their posterity.

NOTES.

PSALM CXXIX. V. 1, 2. It is not improbably conjectured, that this psalm was composed about the time when Sennacherib invaded Judah; yet this is no more than conjecture.—From the days of Jacob, the ancestor of the nation; and still more, from the time when Pharaoh and the Egyptians began to oppress his descendants; the history of Israel had been almost one uninterrupted narrative of the hardships, injuries, and oppressions, to which they had been exposed, from a variety of enemies and persecutors: and yet, God had effectually interposed in their behalf, and no assailant had so prevailed against them, as to destroy them from being a people; nor indeed have they to this day.—The same may be said of the true church of God, and of every believer. 'The church, now afflicted, ought to remember how that her condition hath been such from the beginning, to be molested most grievously by the wicked; yet, in time she hath ever been delivered.... Many a time have the righteous been under persecution, from the hour when Cain rose up against his brother Abel to this day. Like the bush which Moses saw in the desert, the church hath burned with fire, yet hath not been consumed; and for the same reason, because God is in the midst of her. He who took our nature upon him was also "afflicted from his youth:" 'but his enemies prevailed not finally against him.' (Bp. Horne.)

V. 3. They not only scourged us so severely, 'that the marks of it might be seen as plain as the furrows are, which a plowman makes in the ground; but long continued our vexation and torment.' (Bp. Patrick.)—The strong metaphor here employed, seems, however, to mark out all the various refinements of cruelty, by which tyrants and persecutors have tortured the people of God: as Pilate not only scourged Jesus, but delivered him to be crucified. (Notes, cxli. 7. Is. li. 21—23.)

V. 4. In order to torture, they first bound the persecuted sufferer: and in like manner the enslaving of Israel was needful in order to afflict him: but from time to time the righteous God broke the strong cord, or rope, with which he was bound. (Notes, cxliv. 5, 6. Acts ii. 22—24. xvi. 25—28.)

V. 5. "They shall all be confounded," &c. The whole passage is evidently a prediction, and not an imprecation. He that hath delivered Israel, and con-

PSALM CXXX.

The psalmist, in deep distress, cries unto God, confessing his sin, and determined patiently to wait for his gracious forgiveness, 1—6. He exhorts Israel to hope in God's mercy and plenteous redemption, 7, 8.

founded his foes, will continue to do so, till all who persist in enmity to his people shall be destroyed.

V. 6—8. The flourishing and withering of grass is the constant scriptural emblem of the prosperity and ruin of ungodly men. But persecutors are like the worthless grass which grows upon the tops of houses, and withers without coming to any perfection; and consequently hath no blessing pronounced upon it, or employed about it, according to the pious salutations used by Israel to reapers and mowers. (Note, Ruth ii. 4.)—The clause rendered "He that bindeth sheaves," seems to denote the gleaners, who, having gathered ears of corn, and bound them in small bundles, put them in the skirts of their garments, which were held up for that purpose: for reapers or binders do not put the sheaves into their bosom.—There would not only be nothing worth reaping, but nothing worth gleaming.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

If we duly considered, how Jesus was scourged, wounded, bruised, and crucified for us; how prophets, apostles, and saints have been treated in all ages; and how the church hath been afflicted and persecuted from her infancy hitherto; we should not complain of hard measures, if called to endure sharper sufferings than are at present allotted to any of us. And did we remember how Jesus arose and reigns, how his people have been supported, and have triumphed, in sufferings and death; and how the church still subsists, like the burning but unconsumed bush; we should not be anxious about the event respecting ourselves, or the cause of God. He is righteous: and as he hath, so he will, cut asunder the cords which unite persecutors to each other, or with which they would bind his people "as sheep for the slaughter." Nor can all nature furnish an emblem sufficiently expressive of the confusion, contempt, and misery, which will overtake all that hate the church and cause of Christ. They will sink for ever under the unmingled curse and wrath of God, and all spectators will exclaim, "So let all thine enemies perish, O Lord!"

NOTES.

PSALM CXXX. V. 1, 2. David is generally supposed to have been the writer of this psalm; though his name is not prefixed to it. Some think, that it was composed when he was convinced of his exceedingly heinous guilt, in the matter of Uriah, and was in deep inward distress on that account; while others are of opinion, that he wrote it, when in danger of being overwhelmed by the persecuting rage of Saul; and indeed the general acknowledgment of criminality, in common with other men, does not well accord with David's state of mind, when crying for mercy after his most deplorable fall.—It seems, however, that inward distresses, arising from the consciousness of sin, concurring with outward troubles and dangers, in sinking him into those depths, from whence (like Jonah from the whale's belly) he earnestly cried unto the Lord; and was heard and delivered; and therefore it is reckoned one of the penitential psalms.

V. 3, 4. 'If I were the most innocent person in the world; yet if thou, LORD, shouldest strictly examine my life, and proceed against me according to my deserts, I should certainly be condemned.' (Bp. Patrick.)—To mark iniquity," in this connection, implies, to observe strictly every man's conduct, comparing all and every part of it with the holy law, and punishing all deviation from that perfect standard, according to the strict demands of impartial justice. This will be the measure of the Lord's dealings with all the impenitent and unbelieving; but he does not so "mark iniquity," as to exclude the penitent and believing, from mercy and forgiveness, according to the gospel. "For there is forgiveness with him:" or a propitiation, as the original word may signify, and as it is translated by the Septuagint; for "without shedding of blood there is no remission;" and "it is not possible that the blood of bulls and of goats can take away sin."—But with God there is forgiveness, through a propitiatory sacrifice, for those who avail themselves of this gracious provision of his love and mercy: He alone can pardon; forgiveness belongs to him; and he "is ready to forgive," and delights in mercy.—"That thou mayest be feared." 'Thou most graciously invitest us unto the service, by thy readiness to pardon all that are truly penitent; without the hope of which we could not so much as think of becoming religious.' (Bp. Patrick.)—Without the hope of forgiveness, no humble and contrite sinner could escape despair; and none else "have the fear of God before their eyes." So that without this hope, there could be no genuine piety among the fallen descendants of Adam. (Note, Gen. xxii. 11, 12.) For if there were no forgiveness with God, men would not only be without hope, but without the regeneration of the Holy amidst his difficulties upon his first accession to the throne; he made one morning a solemn vow, that he would come to a decision in this matter, before he went to rest. Some think, that the very spot on which the temple should be built, was intended; and that David made this vow on the morning, when the pestilence came upon Israel because he had numbered the people; and that the threshing-floor of Ornan was pointed out to him, in consequence of this resolution.

V. 6. Some learned men conjecture, that Jerusalem lay within the district called Ephratah: but the opinion has no ground at all in Scripture; and Ephratah, or Ephrath, is always joined with Bethlehem, never with Jerusalem. (Marg. Ref.) Christ was indeed, as it had been foretold, born at Bethlehem-Ephratah, (Notes, Mic. v. 2. Matt. ii. 3—6.) He was, doubtless, the true temple, in whom "all the fulness of the Godhead dwells bodily:" but there is no need to suppose, that the place of his birth must, in any sense, be coincident with that on which the temple was to be built: and there is full proof of the contrary. In fact, the enquiry is not, where, either Christ should be born, or where the temple should be erected; but where the ark, the symbol of JEHOVAH's gracious presence, might be found. (8.) The psalmist determined to "find out a place for the LORD, an habitation for the mighty God of Jacob;" that is, a place, in which the ark, the symbol of his presence, might be stationed, as it had been at Shiloh. But, having determined, probably by revelation, to remove the ark to mount Zion; the next enquiry is, where the ark might be found, having long been left in obscurity. David, while resident at Bethlehem-Ephratah, had often heard of the ark as greatly neglected; and, in prospect of being king, had determined to place it in a more conspicuous situation. Accordingly, when made king over all Israel, he had summoned the principal persons of the nation, and had gone in quest of it; and it was found at Kirjath-jearim, as "in the fields of the wood." Thence he and his people at length conveyed it to the station selected for it, on mount Zion; and near to that first station, a magnificent temple was at length prepared for it. (2 Sam. vi. 1 Chr. xiii. 15. xxi. 26—30. xxii. 2 Chr. iii. 1.)

V. 7—9. (2 Chr. vi. 41, 42.) The ark was never removed from the holy of holies in the temple, till the captivity, when it was lost or destroyed. This was therefore "the rest" of the symbol of the Lord's gracious presence with his people. —"Thy priests will be clothed," &c. (9.) It may be expected, that thou, O Lord, wilt overrule this happy event, for a very great blessing to thy priests, and by their means to thy people. —"Clothed with salvation, thy saints rejoice in goodness."

V. 10. "I beseech thee, have a respect to the sincere piety of my father David, and thy gracious promise to him; and upon that account deny me not, but grant the petitions of thy servant, who, by thy special appointment, succeeds him in the government of thy people." (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 11, 12. (Notes, lxxxix. 1—4. 19—37. 2 Sam. vii. 8—16. 1 Kings ix. 6. Jer. xxxiii. 17—26. Luke i. 26—33. Acts ii. 25. 32.)

V. 17. After the decease of David, his kingdom was made to bud forth in his successive descendants, until at length it was established in the person of the Messiah: and the kings, who as lamps, were situated in Jerusalem, arising from David the first anointed of the family, at length introduced the Light of the world, and the glory of Israel.

designs, and pray to be remembered for their sake.—They, who have in them the mind of Christ, will prefer the honour of God, and the welfare of his church, to their own indulgence, ease, or emolument; and will counteract their propensity to procrastination, by engaging themselves as soon as possible to execute useful purposes, to whatever self-denial or weariness they may be exposed. But we should, first, without delay, seek to have our own hearts made "an habitation of God through the Spirit."—Though external splendour or exactness are by no means essential to godliness; yet they, who have it in their power, should be vigilant and diligent in bringing the ordinances of God into public view, and in establishing them in decency and regularity; that the people in general may be encouraged to "go into his tabernacles, and worship at his footstool." When we have used the proper means, we may confidently expect the Lord's presence and blessing; and when his ministers are clothed with righteousness and salvation, his saints will shout for joy.—But if the Lord answered the prayers, grounded on his covenant with David, he will never turn away his face from us, when we plead the covenant made with his anointed Prophet, Priest, and King. In him the promises, which were ratified to David, have their full completion. His church is that Zion, which he hath chosen and desired for his habitation, in which he will rest and be glorified for ever. Whilst he blesses the spiritual provisions of his house to the nourishment of the souls of his people, he will not withhold from his poor the food convenient for their bodies; and blessed are they who are employed to dispense either the bread of life, or bodily sustenance, to his needy servants, out of love to him, and to them for his sake, receiving his salvation themselves, and contributing to the comfort of his saints. But whilst the crown shall flourish in the person of the Son of David, and his people rejoice in his honour and felicity, all his enemies will be clothed with everlasting shame and misery.

NOTES.

PSALM CXXXIII. Title. This psalm seems to have been penned when all the tribes of Israel had concurred in placing David on the throne, or rather after their subsequent prosperity had evinced the happy effects of that union; when, instead of the tribes wasting each other by civil contests, they all harmoniously join in removing the ark to mount Zion, and in celebrating the sacred ordinances of their religion.—"It was as fitly used by the first Christians to express their joy for the blessed union of Jews and Gentiles, and may now serve the uses of all Christian societies, whose happiness lies in holy peace and concord." (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 1. In the union of brethren, all that is reasonable, beneficial, beautiful, and pleasant (however divided in other things) meet together.

V. 2. The sacred ointment which God had prescribed for the unction of his priests to their office, being poured upon the head of Aaron, (and of succeeding high priests,) flowed thence upon his beard, and down on the collar of his vestment, near the place where he bare the names of the twelve tribes, diffusing fragrant around. This was an emblem of the graces of the Holy Spirit, which, through our great high-priest, are communicated to all believers: and it also aptly represented the pleasant and beneficial effects of harmony in society, when, united under one common head, every member, in his proper station, shares, and contributes to, the peace, stability, and prosperity of the whole community.

V. 3. This verse may be rendered, "As the dew of Hermon; so is this, which descends," &c.; and so mean, that, as the gentle dews descending on mount Hermon, render it fruitful and delightful, so the dew of heavenly love, distilling upon the worshippers on mount Zion, would render them fruitful in good works, happy in themselves, and blessings to all around them. For, on that mount, (the type of the true church, which is all one in Christ Jesus, the

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

NOTES.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

If our hearts were filled with the love of God, as his holy law commands, our mouths would be filled with his praises; and though our frail bodies would need rest, yet our souls would never be weary of his pleasant service. No time would then be a burden to us; nor would it be needful to waste the hours by trifling conversation and vain amusements, or by inordinate animal indulgence; but all the time which could be spared from needful business and recreation, would be delightfully employed in meditation, and in celebrating the praises of our God. All that comes short of this is equally distant from perfection; it is the effect of the fall, and the remainder of depravity; and, without some portion of this spirit, we are not Christians. But the servants of God, who minister in his sanctuary, are peculiarly bound to set an example of this cheerful and constant engagement of the heart in the worship and work of God. They, as well as others, should be thankful to be reminded of their duty, and exhorted "to lift up their hands in the sanctuary, and praise the LORD:" and we should especially pray for a blessing out of Zion on those who excite us to attend on our duty. Ere long, all the true servants of God shall praise him in the sanctuary above, and bless his name, and be blessed in him, uninterruptedly, for evermore.

NOTES.

PSALM CXXXV. V. 1, 2. 'This, perhaps, was the morning hymn, which the precentor called upon the Levites to sing at the opening of the gates of the temple, as the former was sung at the shutting up the gates in the evening.' (Bp. Patrick.) (Note. cxxxiv. 1-3.)

V. 3. 'As his nature is most excellent, so he is the fountain of all the good we enjoy; and no employment is so delightful, as to acknowledge his perfections, and commemorate the benefits we have received from him, by singing psalms and hymns of praise and thanksgiving.' (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 5, 6. Other nations, indeed, praised their gods, and celebrated their imaginary exploits: but the psalmist, in the most decided manner, declared that he knew JEHOVAH was far above them all; and alone worthy to be thus adored and honoured as the great Creator, and absolute Sovereign of the universe. (Marg. Ref. Notes cxy 1-7 Is xvi 10 11 Dan iv 34-37 Eph i 3-8)

V. 15—21. (Notes, &c. Ps. cxv. 3—11.) In the scripture referred to, the exhortation is to “trust in the LORD;” here it is “to bless the LORD.” They, who trust in the Lord, honour him, and shall daily have more and more cause to praise him.—‘The honour the heathens give to their lifeless images ought to excite you all, with the greater devotion, to praise the Lord of the world.’ (*Bp. ## PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

How lamentable it is that we should need so much exciting to praise our God, and yet be so negligent and formal as we often are, in this reasonable and delightful employment ! But his servants must on earth be trained up to that holy exercise, in which they are to be occupied for ever in heaven : and in his courts, ministers must instruct, and go before them, in this sacred worship.—The essential goodness and excellency of the Lord, would entitle him to our utmost love and praise, were it possible for us to be free from other obligations to him: and the pleasantness of the work would endear it to us, if our hearts were free from the pestilence of sin. But to the Lord we owe our being, our rational powers, and all our outward comforts; which demand our warmest gratitude: and the peculiar favours vouchsafed to Britons, both in providence, and in the spiritual advantages afforded us, place us in the same relation, and under the same obligations to him, with the Israelites of old. Whilst his moderate rains fructify our land, and we are generally exempted from fatal tempests and inundations; how often have the winds from his treasuries dispersed the preparations of our formidable enemies! How inexcusable then is our national infidelity, impiety, and licentiousness! "O foolish people and unwise, do ye thus requite the Lord!" He has, however, a remnant among us, "whom he has chosen unto him, through sanctification of the Spirit, unto obedience, and the sprinkling of the blood of Jesus." (Note, 1 Pet. i. 1-5.) These are indeed his "peculiar treasure" which he values, by whom he is loved and adored on earth, and in whom he will be eternally glorified. Happy then are they! their unchangeable friend is equally great and good; and equally able and willing to defend, uphold, and bless them. "He doeth what he pleases in heaven, and earth, in the seas, and in all deep places." It hath pleased him to make them his people, and it is his "good pleasure to give them the kingdom." (Note, Luke xii. 32.) The tokens and wonders which he wrought for Israel, and the heritage that he gave them, were feeble shadows of the mercy which he hath shewn to his true Israel, the redemption wrought out, and the inheritance prepared, for them; and every past and present favour is a token and earnest of his future and eternal love. For he is immutably perfect, and the memorial of his wonders for his people shall endure throughout all generations. He will plead their cause, and judge between them and their enemies; and, though he afflict and correct them, he will repent concerning them, and not be wroth with them for ever. (Notes, xc. 13-17.) Whilst therefore we detest the idolatries and impiety of the world around us, let us remember with gratitude who hath made us to differ; let us pity and pray for benighted heathens and deluded sinners; and let us, whether ministers or private Christians, whilst we trust and fear the Lord, bless him in his church on earth, rejoice in hope of praising him in his holy habitation in heaven; and endeavour to glorify his name and recommend his truth, not only with our lips, but in our holy lives, and in copying the example of his righteousness, goodness, and truth, in all our dealings with our brethren and neighbours.

NOTES.

PSALM CXXXVI. V. 1-3. This psalm in many things resembles the preceding: but it is rendered remarkable, by the repetition of the sweet sentence, "for his mercy endureth for ever," at the end of every verse. By mercy we understand the Lord's disposition to compassionate and relieve those whom sin has rendered miserable and vile; his readiness to forgive and be reconciled to the most provoking of transgressors, and to bestow all blessings upon them; together with all the provision which he hath made, for the honour of his name, in the redemption of sinners by Jesus Christ. The counsels of this mercy have been from everlasting; the effects of it will be eternal to all who are interested in it; and the Lord continues, from age to age, equally ready to shew mercy to all who seek to him for it. (Note, cii. 15-18. Marg. Ref.) The frequent repetition of this sentence shews how greatly the Lord delights in mercy, and deems himself honoured by the exercise of it; and teaches us that this attribute should be peculiarly dear to us, being the source of all our hopes and comforts.—"At every half verse, one half of the choir answers to the other in these words: "For his mercy endureth for ever:" a form of acknowledgment prescribed by David to be used continually in the divine service." (Bp. Patrick).—"A form highly proper for creatures, sinful creatures, to use, whose great employment it is now, and will be for ever, to magnify the mercy and lovingkindness of their God." (Bp. Horne).—"This was a common kind of thanksgiving, which the whole people used, when they had received any benefit of God; (Marg. Ref.) meaning that God was not only merciful to their fathers, but also continued the same to their posterity."

V. 4. "How many of those, for whom the wonders of creation, providence, and redemption have been wrought, think none of them worthy their attention! Angels admire and adore, where man will not deign to cast an eye, or employ a thought." (Bp. Horne.) (Note, lxxii. 17-19.)

V. 5-9. (Notes, Gen. i. Marg. Ref.)
V. 10-22. (Notes on the texts referred to in the margin.) The destruction of the Egyptians, Amorites, and Canaanites, with their kings, was a display of God's justice towards them; but of his abundant mercy and goodness to his people. (Notes, lxxviii. 41-54. Neh. ix. 7-22. Is. lxiii. 7-14.)

V. 23-26. (Notes, cxiii. 7-9. Ex. xv. 13. Is. li. 1-3. Ez. xvi. 6-14. Luke i. 46-55. Marg. Ref.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Repetitions, disgusting to the fastidious, are often salutary and necessary, because we are prone to overlook or forget the Lord's goodness and mercy: yet, they convey a severe reproof, and should cause us to unite humiliation with our gratitude to our condescending instructor. (Note, Is. xxix. 9-11. P. O. 1-13.)—The works of creation proclaim the wisdom, power, and goodness of JEHOVAH, the "God of gods, and Lord of lords:" while the continuance of the settled course of nature, and the blessings thus communicated, by a kind Providence, to a rebellious world, are proofs of his patience and ever-enduring mercy. Nay, his denunciations of vengeance against impenitent sinners, should be considered as tokens of his mercy, and improved as warnings to repent, and "to flee from the wrath to come;" and his judgment upon persecutors and oppressors is evidently the effect of his mercy to his church. (Note, Zech. i. 12-21.) The destruction of opposing kings and nations, "with a strong hand and an outstretched arm," was as conducive to the good of Israel, as the manna, the water from the rock, and the conducting cloud. And in like manner, the crucifixion of our lusts, and the sharp corrections by which the Lord promotes our sanctification, are as blessed tokens of his mercy, as the forgiveness of our sins, and the consolations of his Holy Spirit: and our complete salvation will be connected with the final destruction of all the enemies of God and of our souls.—Blessed be his name, who hath remembered us lost sinners in our low estate, and hath provided salvation for us through his Son, and revealed it in his holy word. May we experience his redeeming power in our hearts, that being "saved from our enemies, we may serve him in righteousness all our days;" (Note, Luke i. 67-75;) and may he, who giveth food to all flesh, feed our souls unto eternal life, (Notes, xxii. 26. John vi. 47-58,) and enliven our affections by his grace, that we may give thanks and praise to his holy name, "because he is good, and because his mercy endureth for ever."

PSALM CXXXVII.

The pious captives of Babylon bewail Zion's desolations, complain of the insults of their oppressors, and declare their inviolable attachment to Jerusalem. 1-5. They pray that God would remember the conduct of Edom; and they predict the doom of Babylon. 7-9.

By the rivers of Babylon, there we sat down, yea, we wept, when we remembered Zion.

2 We hanged our harps upon the willows, in the midst thereof.

3 For there they that carried us away captive required of us a song; and they that wasted us required of us mirth, saying, Sing us one of the songs of Zion.

4 How shall we sing the LORD's song in a strange land?

6 If I do not remember thee, let my tongue cleave to the roof of my mouth; if I prefer not Jerusalem above my chief joy.

NOTES.

PSALM CXXXVII. V. 1-6. It is not known by whom this psalm was written, but the occasion is evident; and the pathetic abruptness, so suited to that occasion with which it opens, is admirably beautiful. The captive Jews, by the rivers of Babylon, sat down and wept, whilst they recollected their former prosperity; and especially, they remembered with tears the desolate state of the holy city and the temple of God, their own destitution of sacred ordinances, and the apparently ruined state of the church and people of Israel; for these calamities were brought on them by their national transgressions, to which they had all contributed. No longer therefore able to divert their melancholy by singing songs of praise, they hanged their harps upon the willows, which grew in abundance in that moistened soil, which perhaps they were employed in cultivating. But their insulting victors and oppressors demanded of them to gratify their curiosity, or administer to their entertainment, by singing "one of the songs of Zion;" by which they meant to deride their confidence in JEHOVAH, and to express their triumph over the religion, as well as over the city and country, of the poor captives. (Note, cxxiii. 3, 4.) But they were not only indisposed (probably too much) for joyful praise, but they would not, they could not, profane their sacred songs to increase the insolence of their idolatrous masters; and therefore, they said one to another, or to those who demanded this of them, "How shall we sing the LORD's song in a strange land?" Neither fear nor favour could extort this service from our Levites, but they resolutely answered, As those songs were not made for pastime or sport, but in honour of the great Lord of the world; so, how can you imagine that miserable slaves are disposed to sing? and to sing those songs in the land where we are exiles, which recount the mercies of God to us in our once flourishing country? (Bp. Patrick.) Yet Jerusalem and the interests of religion, were still uppermost in their thoughts and affections; and the psalmist, in the name of his brethren, declared that he would rather be deprived of his skill in music, and have "his tongue cleave to the roof of his mouth," than forget the songs of Zion, or do otherwise than prefer the interests of the church to every personal advantage or pleasure. (Notes, lxxvii. 1, 2. cii. 13-22. cxxiii. 6-9. Marg. Ref.) The persons immediately concerned seem to have been Levites, who had been singers at the temple, and who had brought their instruments along with them. (Notes, 1 Chr. vi. 31-48. xvi. 4-6. xxv.)

V. 7-9. The Edomites, though of the same stock with the Jews, were inveterate in their hatred of them, and excited the Chaldeans utterly to destroy their city and temple; and, for this and other injuries, their ruin had long been predicted. (Notes, Lam. v. 21, 22. Ez. xxv. 12-14. xxxv. Ob. 10-14.) The destruction of Babylon, with every circumstance of terror and misery, had also been foretold. (Marg. Ref.) This was therefore a prayer of the church for deliverance, in the predicted manner, with the extermination of their implacable enemies, root and branch, as Israel had been commissioned to destroy the Canaanites; and a declaration that the persons employed in executing this vengeance on Babylon, and effecting this deliverance of his people, would be peculiarly favoured and prospered by Providence, though the work should be accompanied with the retaliation of those cruelties which had been committed upon the inhabitants of Jerusalem.—Babylon was a type of the antichristian corrupters and oppressors of the new-testament church, which are likewise to be destroyed in a most dreadful manner. (Marg. Ref. Rev. xviii. xix.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

When we are suffering the effects of our personal or national transgressions, we should recollect, with godly sorrow, our forfeited mercies, and our sins by which we have lost them; that by repentance and prayer we may seek deliverance, and the restoration of our privileges. Whilst worldly men grieve for the loss of their outward prosperity, the believer mourns over his banishment from the ordinances of God, and for the despoiled and de-late state of religion: especially when he hears the insults and blasphemies of infidels and profane scoffers; who, being employed to correct the offending people of God, triumph, as if he

PSALM CXXXVIII.

David praises the mercy and truth of God, who had answered his prayers, 1-3. He prophesies that all kings shall praise God, and rejoice in his ways, 4, 5. He shews the Lord's dealings with the humble, and with the proud; and professes full confidence in him, 6-8.

I WILL praise thee with my whole heart: before the gods will I sing praise unto thee.

2 I will worship toward thy holy temple, and praise thy name for thy lovingkindness and for thy lovingkindness and for thy truth: for thou hast magnified thy word above all thy name.

3 In the day when I cried thou answeredst me, and strengthenedst me with strength in my soul.

4 All the kings of the earth shall praise thee, O LORD, when they hear the words of thy mouth.

5 Yea, they shall sing in the ways of the LORD; for great is the glory of the LORD.

could not, or would not, plead their cause. (Notes, xli. 9, 10. xlv. 9-16. lxxvii. 17-23. lxxix. 8-13.) In such circumstances, it is hard to preserve the mind in tranquillity, and to be duly thankful for remaining unmerited mercies. Sacred things, however, must on no consideration be profaned to please ungodly men, nor the songs of Zion sung, to gratify their humour, or embolden their insolence. (Notes, xlix. 7-9. Matt. vii. 6.) In such an evil day it is best to keep silence, or to complain unto God and among his people. Yet no calamity, no strange land, no prevalence of ungodliness, no despised oppressed state of the church, should induce us to forget Jerusalem. If personal advantages and prosperity ever render a professor satisfied at a distance from the ordinances of God, ashamed of his despised cause, or indifferent about the interests of the church, so as not to "prefer them to his chief joy," a "worse calamity has befallen him, than if his right-hand withered," or his "tongue cleaved to the roof of his mouth." For the Lord will not forsake his church in her low estate; he will execute predicted vengeance on all her persecutors, principals and accessories; and if professed Christians join with them in their prosperity, they will be joined with them in the day of wrath. We cannot pray for promised success to the church of God without implying a prayer for the ruin of her implacable enemies; and the instruments of good to the people of God, will, in one way or other, be instrumental to the condemnation of impenitent sinners. It is more agreeable to be instruments of good to the people of God, to our fellow-sinners, than executioners of vengeance on his enemies: though the latter may be accepted and blessed, if men act in obedience to his command, and out of zeal for his glory. (Note, cxlix. 7-9.) Let us, however, be decidedly on the Lord's part, for his cause will at length prevail, and destruction will be to the workers of iniquity: but his true people, though here, as in a strange land, they are often insulted, despised, hated, and grieved, and put out of frame for singing the Lord's song; yet shall soon come to Zion, and resume their harps, and rejoice in their God for evermore. (Is. xxxv. 10.)

NOTES.

PSALM CXXXVIII. Title. The Septuagint entitles this 'A psalm of, or for, David, Hagai, and Zechariah'; perhaps meaning, that these prophets taught the congregation to use it, in giving thanks for Israel's return from captivity.

V. 1. Gods. 'Thy holy angels shall be witnesses of my gratitude, which I will express in psalms and hymns, in the presence of the great assembly of the judges, that they may remember to whom they owe their power and authority.' (Bp. Patrick.) (Notes, lxxvii. 1, 6. cxvi. 5. xxvii. 3-7.) Perhaps the psalmist also meant, that he would praise JEHOVAH in the presence of the most powerful heathen princes, in contempt of the objects of their idolatrous worship, and as a protest against it.

V. 2. (Marg. Ref.) Magnified, &c. The accomplishment of the promises which God had made to David, notwithstanding all opposition and difficulties, peculiarly honoured his word of grace and truth. (Notes, lxi. 3, 4. Matt. xxiv. 35. John i. 17.) In like manner, that display of his glory, which is made by his holy word, and the salvation there revealed, exceeds, and, as it were, eclipses the glory of all his other works; and the giving and fulfilling his promises to sinners are especially "to the praise of his glory," even "the glory of his grace" and truth, "wherein he hath abounded towards us, in all wisdom and prudence." (Notes, lxxv. 10-13. Eph. i. 1-12. 1 Pet. i. 10-12.)

V. 3. When God strengthens the faith, hope, love, patience, and holy fortitude of his afflicted servants, he strengthens them with strength in their souls; and, though their outward trials and sufferings continue, yet their prayers are answered in the most desirable manner. (Notes, Is. xl. 27-31. 2 Cor. xii. 7-10. Eph. iii. 4-9. Phil. iv. 10-13. Col. i. 9-14.)

V. 4, 5. Perhaps David expected that his example and instructions would have a good effect on the neighbouring princes. (Notes, lxxvii. 9. cxix. 46.) These verses, however, are an evident and remarkable prophecy of the calling of the Gentiles, and of such a prevalence of true religion as hath not yet taken

6 "Though the LORD be high, yet hath he respect unto the lowly: "but the proud he knoweth 'afar off.

7 "Though I walk in the midst of trouble, 'thou wilt revive me: 'thou shalt stretch forth thine hand against the wrath of mine enemies, 'and thy right-hand shall save me.

8 The LORD will 'perfect that which concerneth me: 'thy mercy, O LORD, endureth for ever: 'forsake not the works of thine own hands.

PSALM CXXXIX.

David contemplates, with adoring surprise, the omniscience and omnipresence of God, 1-13. He praises him, as his all-wise and bountiful Creator, and for his numberless mercies, 14-18. He avows his abhorrence of the wicked; and prays to be searched, proved, and directed in the right way, 19-24.

To the chief Musician, A Psalm of David.

O LORD, 'thou hast searched me, and known me.

2 Thou 'knowest my downsitting and mine uprising; 'thou understandest my thought 'afar off.

3 Thou 'compassest 'my path and my lying down, 'and art acquainted with all my ways.

4 For 'there is not a word in my tongue, but, lo, O LORD, 'thou knowest it altogether.

5 'Thou art about me, O LORD, 'and thou hast searched me, and known me.

6 'Thou art about me, O LORD, 'and thou hast searched me, and known me.

7 'Thou art about me, O LORD, 'and thou hast searched me, and known me.

NOTES.

PSALM CXXXIX. Title. It is probable that David wrote this psalm, when accused of traitorous designs against Saul; as a solemn appeal to God that he was, in that respect, entirely innocent. (Notes, vii. 3-11.)

V. 1. (Marg. Ref.) 'I am accused of grievous crimes, O Lord; but my comfort is, that thou seest I am not guilty of them.' (Bp. Patrick.)—The language employed in this and the following verses, is taken from the affairs of men; who by diligent search find out those things which have been carefully concealed from them. (Notes, Gen. xi. 5. xviii. 20, 21.)

V. 2. (Marg. Ref.) Thought. 'He confesseth that neither our actions, thoughts, nor any part of our life, can be hid from God, though he seem afar off.—My inclinations are so perfectly understood by thee, that before I have conceived any design, it is visible to thee.' (Bp. Patrick.) (Notes, xvii. 1-3. xlv. 17-22.)

'My thoughts, before they are my own,
Are to my God distinctly known,
He knows the words I mean to speak,
Ere from my opening lips they break.' (Watts.)

V. 3. Men are most tempted to sin, either, when, being from home, they are no longer under restraint from such of their neighbours or relations, whose censure they dread; or when in secret, as in the bedchamber, they have no apprehension of being detected by any human eye: but the psalmist recollected, that God saw him, and was present with him, in every situation; as He "compassed his path and bed, and was acquainted with all his ways," even those which he most carefully concealed from his fellow-creatures. (Marg. Ref.) (Notes, Job xiv. 16-22. xxxi. 1-4.)

V. 4-6. (Marg. Ref.) 'When we reflect, that "all things are naked and open to him with whom we have to do;" that although he dwelleth in the highest heavens, he surveyeth not only the outward acts, but even the very hearts and imaginations of men on earth; must not each of us cry out, "Such knowledge is too wonderful for me! it is high, I cannot attain unto it!" I cannot admire it enough; for I cannot conceive of it aright!' (Bp. Horne.) (Note, xl. 1-5.)—The actual constant consideration of God's presence would be the readiest way in the world to make sin to cease from among the children of men, and for men to approach to the blessed estate of the saints in heaven, who cannot sin; for they always walk in the presence, and behold the face, of God.' (Bp. Taylor.)—It should, however, be noted, that if it were possible for unregenerate men thus habitually to think of the eye of God always upon them; it would no more change their carnal enmity into love, than it does that of evil spirits. Nothing but regeneration, and the sanctification of the Holy Spirit, can make fallen men holy; and the efficacy of all means depends on his powerful operation to render them successful.

V. 7, 8. (Note, Gen. iii. 8. 9. Jer. xxiii. 24, 25. Jonah i. 2, 3. Acts v. 1-11.) Bed in hell, &c. (5.) 'An uncomfortable place to make a bed in, where there is no rest day or night; yet thousands will make their bed for ever in those flames.' (Henry.)—Should any one murder himself to terminate his sorrows, and escape the remorse of conscience or the consequences of his sins; he must certainly be disappointed. Yet the presence of God, with the senseless corpse in the grave, could not in any degree cause this disappointment, or produce the least effect: but his presence with the disembodied spirit, in the invisible world, as an angry Judge, must in that case be as dreadful, as it is unexpected.—This then is one passage, where the word sheol cannot mean exclusively the grave, without rendering the sacred writer's argument absurd and frivolous. (Note, xvi. 8-11.)

V. 9, 10. (Marg. Ref.) Wings, &c. Or sun-beams. (9.) Could I travel as fast as the rays of light, &c.—The same considerations, which should restrain us from sin, should also encourage us to work righteousness; and comfort us under all our sorrows; namely, the thought, that we are never out of the sight and protection of our Maker.—The piety and charity which are practised in

I was made in secret, and curiously wrought 'in the lowest parts of the earth.

16 Thine eyes did see my substance, yet being imperfect; and in thy book all my members were written, which in continuance were fashioned, when as yet there was none of them.

17 How precious also are thy thoughts unto me, O God! 'how great is the sum of them!

18 If I should count them, 'they are more in number than the sand: 'when I awake, I am still with thee.

19 'Surely thou wilt slay the wicked, O God: 'depart from me therefore, ye bloody men.

cottages; the labour and pain which are patiently endured in the field, or on the bed of sickness; the misery and torment inflicted by persecution, in the mines, the galleys, and the dungeons, are all under the inspection of JEHOVAH, and are noted by him against the day of recompense.' (Bp. Horne.) (Notes, lxxiii. 23—28. Is. xli. 10—14. xlii. 13—17.)

V. 11, 12. (Notes, Job xxii. 5—14. xxxvi. 5—13. xxxiv. 20—30. 1 Cor. iv. 2—5. Heb. iv. 12, 13.)

V. 13. 'My most retired thoughts and contrivances, and my most secret desires, are apparent to thee; whose I am, and by whom I was wrapt up...in my mother's womb, than which nothing is more hidden and dark.' (Bp. Patrick.) (Note, Job x. 8—13. Marg. Ref.)

V. 14. 'A work so astonishing, that before the psalmist proceeds in his description of it; he could not help breaking forth in rapture at the thought.' (Bp. Horne.)—(Note, civ. 24.) The verse may be rendered perhaps more literally; 'I will praise thee, for in considering thy wonders, I am filled with astonishment. Thy works are admirable; and my soul knoweth it exceedingly!'

V. 15. 'By the lowest parts of the earth, is undoubtedly to be understood the womb, where the fetus is gradually formed, and matured for the birth, like plants under ground. The process is compared to that in a piece of work wrought with a needle, or fashioned in a loom, which, with all its beautiful variety of colour, and proportion of figure, ariseth by degrees unto perfection, under the hand of the artist—from a rude mass of silk, &c. But whereas the human artificer must have the clearest light, whereby to accomplish his task;...the divine work-master...effecteth all his wonders, in the dark and narrow confines of the womb.' (Bp. Horne.)

V. 16. 'When the matter, out of which I was made, was without any form, it was visible to thee, how every muscle, vein, and artery, with all the rest of my body, should be wrought, out of the pattern of them which was in thy mind: and accordingly in time, when there was not so much as one of them, they were all fashioned for the several uses by which they were designed, and not the smallest of them omitted or left imperfect.' (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 17, 18. David delighted to meditate upon the works and perfections of God; such thoughts were precious to him: the glory displayed in them was infinite, the mercies communicated to him were innumerable as the sand; they were new every morning, and were increased with every returning day. (Notes, xl. 1—5. Prov. viii. 30, 31. Is. lv. 8, 9. Lam. iii. 21—23. Eph. iii. 9, 10.) 'The thoughts or counsels of JEHOVAH, concerning David, his appointment to the throne, his troubles and preservations in the midst of them, were precious and delightful subjects of meditation and praise; never to be exhausted of the rich matter they contained. With these in his mind, he lay down at night to rest; and when he awoke in the morning, his thoughts naturally recurred to the pleasing theme: he began where he had left off; and found himself, in heart and soul, still present with God, still ruminating on him and his works. The mercies of God, in the redemption of the church, according to the Divine decree; how precious are they to believers! how great is the sum, far exceeding all human arithmetic to name them! Let them be to us the constant subjects of contemplation. Let death find us engaged in this employment; which when we awake, and arise from the grave, we shall resume, and prosecute to eternity, in the presence of God.' (Bp. Horne.)

V. 19—22. It is probable, that when David composed this psalm his character lay under a load of calumny: (Note, title:) but he could appeal to God that he would have no fellowship with ungodly and cruel men, whom he knew God would destroy: he detested their characters and conduct, and could not endure their company. (Notes, xxvi. 5—11.) Being enemies and blasphemers of God, he considered them as his enemies. For the godly man hath the same friends and enemies with the Lord, as far as he knows the real characters of men: (Note, Rom. v. 1, 2.) yet this is entirely consistent with loving their persons, praying for them, and being kind to them; for we do not know, but they may yet be converted and reconciled to God. The clause rendered 'thine enemies take thy name in vain,' may mean, that they called God to witness the truth of their lying accusations: but it may be translated, 'they lift up themselves in vain;' as they will surely be cast down.

V. 23, 24. The psalmist began by professing his belief, that God had searched him out and known him, (Note, l: and he concluded by praying, that 'he would search him, and know his heart and his thoughts:' he did not wish to decline the investigation: he desired to have his real character ascertained, and the springs of his conduct laid open; that he might know himself, and discover every sinful part of his conduct, and repent of it; and that he might be led in the good old way, unto everlasting life; as well as be vindicated from calumnies and suspicions. (Marg. Ref.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—12. It is far more profitable to meditate on divine truths, with application to our own cases, and with hearts lifted up to God in prayer; than with a speculative, curious, and disputing frame of mind. The omniscience and omnipresence of God are generally acknowledged: yet, they seldom produce their practical effect upon the hearts and conduct of mankind; because they are not apprehended by a true and vigorous faith. Hence it is, that such numbers allow that their Judge is witness to their whole conduct; and yet are careful to save appearances with their fellow-criminals, whilst they transgress in secret, and amuse their depraved imaginations with every kind of speculative wickedness. Nay, even true believers, through weakness of faith, are often very wavering in obedience, and easily discouraged from it by the trivial circumstances of time, place, company, or solitude. We should therefore, by meditation and prayer, seek to have our minds suitably affected with the firm belief and habitual recollection, that the just, the holy, the almighty God fully searches us out, and knows us, however our fellow-creatures may mistake or misrepresent our characters. We should seriously consider, when we are alone, or in company, in the shop, the market, the place of worship, or the closet, that the eye of God is upon us; 'that he observeth our down-sitting and our up-rising, and understandeth our thoughts,' whether good or bad, before they become distinctly observed by our own minds, or influential upon our conduct; that he compasseth and investigateth our path, and is accurately acquainted with all our ways; and that he will bring every secret work into judgment, with every word of our lips, and every thought of our hearts. (Notes, Matt. xii. 33—37. Rev. xx. 11—15.) For our God surrounds us continually, and so lays his hand upon us, that we cannot move, or think, without his cognizance and consent. Such meditations are suited to restrain us from sin, even in seasons when secrecy and present advantage give force to Satan's temptations; and to counteract the sinful inclinations as soon as it begins to move. Who would dare, if thus suitably impressed, to defraud or deceive his neighbour; to gratify in secret his lust, or malice; or to assume a mask of piety, to cover his avarice, injustice, ambition, or sensuality? Recollections of this kind are equally calculated to encourage the believer, in his secret prayers, meditations, self-denial, and almsgiving; in his well-meant but misrepresented endeavours to do good; and in his conscientious obedience amidst slanders and reproaches, or in the most obscure station in society. We soon indeed find, that we cannot comprehend the manner in which the infinite God knoweth all things; but, while, faith apprehends the truth, upon his sure testimony, humility adores the mystery, and confesses, that 'such knowledge is too wonderful for her; and is so high she cannot attain unto it.' The belief of God's omnipresence is intimately connected with that of his omniscience, and is of similar efficacy. Should the guilty wretch desire to shun the presence of that God, whose power he cannot resist, and whose mercy he scorns to supplicate; whither shall he flee from him, who is an infinite and all-pervading spirit? Were it possible for him to find admission into heaven, the displays of the glorious holiness of JEHOVAH would be intolerable to him. The grave, nay, the centre of the earth, could not place him at a distance from his righteous Judge: the presence of a God of vengeance kindles the flames of hell; were it possible for him to fly with the velocity of the sunbeams to the most distant regions, or through the immensity of space, he would still meet the presence of his offended God, from whom no darkness can conceal him; 'for the darkness and the light to him are both alike.' On the other hand, the believer cannot be removed or banished, from the supporting comforting presence of his almighty friend; who was with Joseph in the prison, with the three young Jews in the fiery furnace, and with Daniel in the lions' den. Should the persecutor's rage take away his life, his soul will the sooner ascend into heaven, and be more sensibly present with his Father and friend, to his unutterable joy. The grave cannot separate his body from the love of his Saviour, who will raise it incorruptible and glorious. Could he even enter the place of torment, the presence and love of God would prevent his feeling misery. A desolate island, or the remotest region inhabited by the worst of savages; the sultry heat of the torrid zone, or the benumbing cold of polar regions; the deep dark dungeon, cavern, or mine; can by no means exclude him from his God.—Whilst he is in the path of duty, he may be happy in any situation, by the exercise of faith, and hope, and prayer. But should he sinfully shift his duty, and like Jonah, attempt to flee from the presence of the Lord, his arm would arrest, his frown dismay, and his rod correct him, in every place. We should then enquire what the Lord would have us to do, and whither we ought to remove? and pray that his gracious presence may always attend us; and then we shall have every thing to hope, and nothing to fear, in life, in death, or in the eternal world. (Notes, lxxiii. 23—28. Ex. xxxiii. 12—16. P. O. 12—23. Prov. iii. 5, 6.)

V. 13—24. The omnipresent God is our creator, and has a right to possess and dispose of us as his property: he comprehends our whole frame, which is his marvellous workmanship. The wise and kind contrivance, with which our bodies are formed, should excite our reverent admiration and gratitude; and surely we ought not to use our members and senses, which the Lord hath so curiously fashioned in the womb, as instruments of unrighteousness unto sin. (Notes, Rom. vi. 12—19. xii. 1. 1 Cor. vi. 18—20.) But our immortal and rational souls are still a more noble work and gift of God. Yet had it not been

4 Keep me, O LORD, from the hands of the wicked: preserve me from the violent man; who have purposed to overthrow my goings.

5 The proud have hid a snare for me, and cords, they have spread a net by the wayside; they have set gins for me. Selah.

6 I said unto the LORD, Thou art my God: hear the voice of my supplications, O LORD.

7 O God the Lord, the strength of my salvation, thou hast covered my head in the day of battle.

8 Grant not, O LORD, the desires of the wicked: further not his wicked device, lest they exalt themselves. Selah.

PSALM CXLI.

David earnestly requests the acceptance of his prayers, to be preserved from sinful words, works, and indulgences, 1—4. He desires the reproofs of the righteous, whom he will recompense by his prayers; and hopes to win on his people when afflicted, 5, 6. He complains, that his friends were cruelly slain, professes confidence in God, and predicts the fall of the wicked, 7—10.

A Psalm of David.

LORD, I cry unto thee: make haste unto me; give ear unto my voice, when I cry unto thee.

2 Let my prayer be set forth before thee as incense; and the lifting up of my hands as the evening sacrifice.

V. 10. 'Their lips, which uttered mischief against others, shall be the means of covering themselves with confusion, when out of their own mouths they shall be judged. Those tongues, which have contributed to set the world on fire, shall be tormented with the hot burning coals of eternal vengeance; and they who, with so much eagerness and diligence, have prepared pits for the destruction of their brethren, shall be cast into a deep and bottomless pit, out of which they will not rise up again any more for ever.' (Bp. Horne.) All the verbs are future.—'He shall cause them to fall into the fire.'—(Notes, xi. 6. cxx. 4. Mark ix. 43—50.)

V. 11. 'A lying lip is but for a moment; it serves a present purpose, and often proves for a while very successful; but at length it defeats its own purposes, and never effects established prosperity. (Note, Prov. xi. 18, 19.) The original is, "A man of tongue shall not be established," &c., one who does not bridle his tongue.—The similitude of evil, or punishment, hunting the violent man, as the hounds do the fleeing animal, through all its windings and doublings, till they seize upon it, is very emphatical. (Marg. Ref. Note, Prov. xlii. 21.)

V. 12, 13. (Notes, x. 17, 18. cii. 13—22. Marg. Ref.) PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The seed of the old serpent, instigated by their father, will unite subtlety with violence, in executing the mischiefs which they have imagined in their hearts against the children of God: slanders will be devised to cloak their unprovoked malice; they will sharpen their tongues to ruin their reputation, as the serpent's fatal bite envenoms the blood; for 'adder's poison is under their lips.' Especially they will lay artful stratagems to overthrow their goings, and to betray them into some real or seeming crime, which may furnish a plausible handle against them. All this we have seen illustrated in the history of David the type, but it is still more manifest in the history of Christ, the great antitype. In such circumstances, therefore, we should especially watch and pray, that the Lord would "hold up our goings in his ways, that our footsteps slip not." He is the strength of salvation to all who trust and worship him as their God: he will hear their prayers, and cover their head in the day of battle: every former deliverance is an earnest of future and final victory: and they may unreservedly pray, that he would not grant the desires of the wicked, nor further their wicked devices, lest they grow more insolent. We may also be confident, that false accusers will, by their lies and perjuries, bring mischief upon themselves, even the burning coals of divine vengeance, which will sink them into the fire and deep pit of hell, to rise no more; except timely repentance prevent the fatal doom. For 'an evil speaker shall not be established in the earth: evil shall hunt the violent man to overthrow him.' But when the Lord hath proved the faith and patience of his afflicted people, he will maintain their cause, and do them justice against their oppressors. And beyond all doubt, 'the upright shall dwell in God's presence,' and give him thanks for evermore.

NOTES.

PSALM CXLI. Title. This psalm is generally allowed to have been written by David, when driven among the Philistines by the implacable persecution of Saul. (Notes, 1 Sam. xxvii.)—'Nobody need wonder that there are so many prayers founded on the same subject: for that persecution endured long, and they were made upon different occasions, or for different purposes; and David loved to spend his time in such devout meditations.' (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 1, 2. (Note, lxxi. 12.)—Let, &c. (2.) Or, 'My prayer shall be set before thee, as incense,' &c.—When driven from the courts of the Lord and the communion of his people, the psalmist purposed to be as regular and constant at his devotions, as the priests were in burning incense, and offering the sacrifices morning and evening: and he prayed, that his fervent supplications might be accepted, even as if presented at the sanctuary, being offered with a believing reference to the typical expiation and intercession there made for his "precious thoughts" of love to us, our reason and immortality would, through our sins, have proved the occasion of our eternal misery. How should we then delight to meditate on his love to sinners in Jesus Christ, the sum of which exceeds all computation! the mercies thence derived are numberless as the sands of the sea. Every morning we awake more indebted, and ought to be more grateful, than before: but when we shall awake in the world of glory, how shall we admire and bless our God for this invaluable salvation!—Yet this God of infinite mercy will most surely destroy all the impenitent workers of iniquity. We should therefore warn our fellow-sinners "to flee from the wrath to come;" and protest against their crimes by separating from their company. (Notes, 2 Chr. xix. 2, 3. 2 Cor. vi. 14—18. Eph. v. 8—14.) But those bloody men, who persecute the people of God, and thus join cruelty to their impiety and blasphemy, are most eminently the enemies and haters of God himself; and should be shunned with marked abhorrence by all who love him and his cause; yet we should still pray for their conversion and salvation.—As the Lord knows us perfectly, and we are such strangers to ourselves, we should earnestly desire and pray to be searched and proved, in his providence, and by his word and Spirit; thus we shall best be preserved from self-deception, gradually purified from our remaining sinfulness, and led in the way of everlasting life: and these our desires and prayers will evidence our sincerity, and increase our comfortable assurance, that we are the children of God. (Note, John iii. 18—24.)

NOTES.

PSALM CXL.—Title. It is evident that David composed this psalm, when persecuted by Saul, slandered by Doeg, and betrayed by the Ziphites and others. (Notes, lii. cxx.) 'When he came to the kingdom, and had settled the service of God, in the manner which we read in the first of Chronicles, he delivered it to the master of music, to be sung at certain times at the tabernacle. But it was not found, I suppose, (any more than the two foregoing, and the four following,) till some time after the other books of psalms were published; and so they were placed here all together, by him that collected this book.' (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 1, 2. Saul, or Doeg, was "the evil man," and "the man of violence;" but there were many others who concurred in all the designs formed against the life of David, and who were employed in devising plans for that purpose; as Caiaphas and Judas had many helpers, in their machinations against the life of the holy Jesus. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 3. 'Slander and calumny must always precede and accompany persecution; because malice itself cannot excite people against a good man as such, to do this he must first be represented as a bad man.—What can be said to those who are busy in this manner, but that they are "a generation of vipers," the brood of the old serpent, that grand accuser and calumniator of the brethren: having under their tongues a bag of poison, conveying instant death to the reputation on which they fasten?—Thus David was hunted as a rebel, Christ was crucified as a blasphemer, and the primitive Christians were tortured as guilty of incest and murder.' (Bp. Horne.) (Notes, lviii. 4. lix. 7. lxi. 2—5. Prov. xii. 18, 19. Jer. ix. 3—6. Jam. iii. 3—6.)

V. 4—6. (Notes, x. 2—13. xvii. 8—13. cxli. 9, 10. cxlii. 1—3.)

V. 7, 8. (Notes, cxlv. 10. xciv. 20, 21. 2 Sam. xv. 31.) Covered, &c. 'He calleth to God with lively faith, being assured of his mercies: because he had beforetime proved, that God helped him ever in his dangers.' (Notes, 1 Sam. xvii. 34—37. 45—51. 2 Cor. i. 8—10.)

V. 9. Some render this verse "The poison of those that compass me about, even the mischief of their own lips, shall cover them." (Note, 3.) The original word, translated "the head," signifies also poison; especially the poison of serpents, which is collected in their heads.

3 'Set a watch, O LORD, before my mouth; 'keep the door of my lips.

4 'Incline not my heart to any evil thing; 'to practise wicked works with men that work iniquity: 'and let me not eat of their dainties.

5 Let 'the righteous 'smite me; it shall be a kindness: and let him reprove me; it shall be an excellent oil, which shall not break my head: 'for yet my prayer also shall be in their calamities.

6 When 'their judges are overthrown in stony places, 'they shall hear my words, 'for they are sweet.

7 Our 'bones are scattered at the grave's mouth, as when one cutteth and cleaveth wood upon the earth.

8 But 'mine eyes are unto thee, O God the

+ Or, smite me kindly and reprove me; let not their precious oil break my head, &c. Matt. v. 44. 2 Tim. i. 16-18. (Notes, 1 Kings viii. 28-30.) It is probable, that this psalm was composed at the time of the morning or evening sacrifice; and that David (as Daniel afterwards) poured out his prayers with his face towards Zion. The word, however, rendered "sacrifice," does not signify the lamb for a burnt-offering every morning and evening, but the meat-offering which accompanied it. (Num. xxviii. 4, 5.) This is supposed by some learned men to have been typical of our Saviour's holy and useful life, by which he "fulfilled all righteousness," and set us "an example that we should follow his steps;" as the lamb slain typified his expiatory sufferings. So that the psalmist seems to have selected this word, to express his desire that his prayers might be accepted, as the meat-offering at the sanctuary, rather than as the burnt-offering, perhaps in order the more clearly to exclude the idea of expiation.

V. 3, 4. David, surrounded by idolaters, (who would watch all his words and actions, suspect him as a spy, or an enemy, or want to draw him into idolatry, besought God to enable him so to bridle his tongue, that he might not give them any advantage against him; (Notes, xxxix. 1-4. Marg. Ref.) and so to govern and rule his heart, that he might not be seduced into any sinful compliances. In such company he feared lest he should be tempted to trifle, to dissimble, or to speak inconsistently with his character as a zealous worshipper of the true God; or, as some think, lest he should be led to express his sense of the ill usage which he had received from Saul in an unbecoming manner, and therefore he prayed for a guard to be placed before his mouth. He was also aware that corrupt examples continually before his eyes, might gradually draw him aside; and he prayed that his heart might not be inclined to any evil thing, or to join the impieties and iniquities of the Philistines; and that he might not be tempted by their idolatrous feasts, or hospitable entertainments, so eat of such things as were forbidden by the law of God.—Incline not, &c., evidently means, 'Keep my heart so, that I may not be suffered to incline to evil.' (Note, cxix. 36. Deut. ii. 30. Is. lxiii. 15-19.)

V. 5. Jealous of himself in so ensnaring a situation, the psalmist prayed that some pious friends might ever be present, to reprove him sharply if he yielded to temptation. This he would take most kindly, sensible that it would neither break his head, nor cause him to hang it down in dejection; but, being insinuating and healing, like an excellent oil, it would be very useful to him; and he would requite the benefit by praying for them in their calamities, if he had no other way of expressing his gratitude. (Notes, 1 Sam. xxv. 23-33.) Or, This would enable him more fervently, and as with renewed vigour, to pray against their wickedness, (that of the idolaters,) which he had been almost induced to imitate. Perhaps David obliquely hinted at the slanders of Saul and his party, from which he distinguished the censures of the pious Israelites, who might blame him for going into the land of the Philistines. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 6. This verse may mean according to our translation, that David, foreseeing the ruin of Saul and his party, the present "judges" of Israel, as if they had been cast from the sides of a rock, or cut in pieces in rocky places by the enemy, without being able to escape, hoped that the Israelites would then hearken to his salutary admonitions, which they now disregarded. "The people which followed their wicked rulers in persecuting the prophet, shall repent and turn to God, when they see their wicked rulers punished. The following is a literal translation: "Their judges have been dismissed in the sides of the rock, and have heard my words, that they were sweet." David mentions his own behaviour to his implacable enemy, whose life he had spared at two several times, when he had it in his power to destroy him. Their judges, or princes, "have been dismissed, in the sides of the rock," when I had them at an advantage, and...they only heard me expostulate with them in a manner so mild and humble, that even Saul himself was overcome, and...wept. Yet how have my people also been by them most miserably butchered! (Bp. Horne.) (Notes, 1 Sam. xxiv. xxvi.)

V. 7. This, probably refers to the slaughter of the hundred and eighty-five priests, and their families, by Doeg, at Saul's command, because they were supposed to favour David. The bones of this company, murdered on his account, were thrown at the grave's mouth, as plentifully, and as disregarded, as the chips are scattered about by one that cleaveth wood upon the ground. (Notes, xlv. 17-22. 1 Sam. xxii. 8-19. Rom. viii. 35-39.)—In this verse, the word sheol certainly means the grave.

V. 8, 9. (Note, cxxiii. 1, 2. Marg. Ref.) 'Not only preserve me from the snares which my persecutors have laid for me, but likewise from the allure-

PSALM CXLII.

David complains of his persecutors, and expresses his confidence and joy in God, 1-7.

*Maschil of David; A Prayer 'when he was in the cave.

I CRIED unto the LORD with my voice: 'with my voice unto the LORD did I make my supplication.

ments of all other wicked men, especially the idolatrous Philistines among whom I sojourn.'

V. 10. 'David escaped all the snares that were laid for him on every side; he lived to see the death of Saul, who fell in battle with the Philistines, and those Philistines subdued by himself and his subjects.' (Bp. Horne.)—"The wicked shall fall," &c. (Marg. Ref.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The believer will maintain communion with his God, wherever he goes; the greater his trials are, the more fervent will his prayers be; and when they are presented through the Saviour's oblation and intercession, they are as acceptable to God as the daily sacrifices and burning of incense were of old.—We have always need to intreat the Lord to "set a watch before the door of our lips;" but especially when we are constrained to associate with ungodly men, where we shall continually be urged to speak, and tempted to speak improperly, out of fear, shame, or complaisance: and where we can scarcely speak at all without giving them some cause of error, prejudice, or offence. If surrounded by such contagious examples, we shall likewise have especial cause to "keep our hearts with all diligence," and to pray continually that they may not be "inclined to any evil thing, or to practise wicked works with men that work iniquity." Our appetites, also, must be bridled, lest they be bribed by their luxuries, or we be prevailed upon by seducing solicitations, to sanction their excesses, or iniquities, by the least approach to inordinate indulgence. (Note, Prov. xxiii. 1-3.)—If it be our trial to be cast into such a situation, we may expect that the Lord will preserve us in it; though it will require extraordinary watchfulness and constancy in prayer, and we are generally most remiss on such occasions; but if any, from carnal motives, run into such temptations, they seldom escape unpolluted, or unwounded. In all places, however, we should fear sin more than suffering; and rather be desirous to honour God, than to recommend or advance ourselves. Such desires, will not only dictate our prayers, but induce us to welcome the rebukes of our heavenly Father, and also the reproofs of our brethren. We should, indeed, study to profit by the reproaches of our enemies, and by the severe rebukes of those who mean well, but are unskilful; but that reproof which is given with prudence, meekness, piety, and affection, insinuates and lubricates like a healing ointment—it causes little pain or irritation, and produces abundant good; and no benefactors are more entitled to our gratitude and our prayers, than reprovers of this character, because none serve us in a more disinterested and self-denying manner. Yet, alas! flatterers are generally more favoured, even by professed Christians; and this plain-dealing is lamentably sunk into disuse, to the unspeakable detriment of true piety.—We should be unwearied in our endeavours to do good; those instructive and affectionate words, which sinners despised in their prosperity, may, perhaps, be attended to in adversity; or when the ruin of ringleaders, or associates in iniquity, concurs in shewing them their danger and misery; and we ought to watch for such opportunities. Nor should any injuries make us reluctant to do good to our opponents, even though they have wasted the church, as king Saul, and as Saul of Tarsus did, till the bones of the ministers and people of God lie scattered abroad, as the chips around him who heweth wood. Indeed, if we be not exposed to such calamities, our bones will soon lie scattered at the mouth of the grave, and others will moralize over them, as we are wont to do when we traverse a burying ground, and behold an opened grave. Let us then lift our eyes unto God the LORD, and trust in him that our souls shall not then be left destitute: let us intreat him to rescue us from the snares of Satan, and of all the workers of iniquity, that we may escape and be blessed for ever, whilst the wicked fall into their own nets and perish.

NOTES.

PSALM CXLII. Title. On one occasion, David, driven from the court of Achish, with only a very small company, hid himself in the cave of Adullam; where, at length, he was joined by a considerable number of adherents. (Note, 1 Sam. xxii. 1, 2.) On another, he was hidden in a cave when Saul and his army came to seek for him; thus he was in extreme danger, till Saul, by inadvertently entering the cave, put himself in his power, and gave him an opportunity of shewing his determination not to injure his prince, and also of escaping for the present. (Notes, 1 Sam. xxv.) It is not certain to which of these events this psalm belongs.—But, however that may be, David seems to have formed the substance of the prayer which he made before God in the 7 Bring ¶my soul out of prison, that I may praise thy name: ¶the righteous shall compass me about; for ¶thou shalt deal bountifully with me.

PSALM CXLIII.

David earnestly deprecates the severity of God's judgment, complains of his enemies and distresses, and strengthens his faith by meditating on the works of God, 1-5. He fervently prays for comfort, guidance, quickening, and deliverance; and foretells the destruction of his enemies, 6-12.

extremity of his danger, into a psalm, when he had obtained deliverance; though some think that it ought to be rendered in the present tense, as the very prayer which he made in the cave. (Notes, Is. xxxix. 9-13. Jon. ii. 1, 2.)

V. 1-3. 'Though destitute of human help, I will not despair of safety, but with more fervent cries implore the Divine succour.—I will lay before him (God) all the sad thoughts which perplex my heart; and representing the miserable straits wherein I am, expose myself to him as an object of his pity.'—'Now that I am utterly at a loss, and ready to faint away in the confusion of my thoughts, thou knowest very well a way for my escape; though, by the intelligence, they (Saul and his party) hold with my enemies, they have blocked up all the passages which I am acquainted with, and laid ambushes for me in every road.' (Bp. Patrick.) (Marg. Ref. Notes, i. 4-6. lxi. 2.)

V. 4. The original is in the imperative, "Look thou on my right hand," &c. (Marg.) Some consider it as a prayer to God to look on the extremity of his case; others as a kind of soliloquy;—"Look about thee, O my soul, if thou canst spy any hope of relief from thy best and most powerful friends. There are none of them that dare to own thee, nor do I know whither to flee for safety." (Bp. Patrick.) (Marg. Ref.)

V. 5. (Notes, xi. 1-5. John xvi. 31-33. Marg. Ref.)

V. 6. 'O let my importunate cry prevail for some relief, which will come most seasonably in this extreme necessity. Rescue me now, that I may not fall into the hands of my persecutors, who are every way, (except in these cries unto, and confidence in, thee,) much too strong for me.' (Bp. Patrick.) (Note, cxvi. 6. Marg. Ref.)

V. 7. (Note, Title.) The cave, in which David was hidden, was like a prison to confine him, till Saul should come and put him to death; unless God would mercifully deliver him, according to his word, of which he did not allow himself to doubt. Nay, he anticipated the season, when his grateful praises would attract the notice of all the pious Israelites; and when he should be as much surrounded by admiring multitudes, as he was now shunned by all. (Notes, vii. 6, 7. xlii. 5, 6.) In this he was a type of Christ, as deserted in the garden; and as exalted to be a prince and Saviour.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

There can be no situation so distressing, perilous, or disgraceful, in which faith will not derive comfort from God by fervent prayer. (Notes, 1 Sam. xxx. 6. Acts xvi. 25-28.) In our great perplexities, when our spirits are overwhelmed by distress, and filled with confusion and discouragement, and when we see snares laid for us on every side; we may reflect with comfort, "that the Lord knoweth our path;" and if we aim to walk in his way, he will protect and guide us, and extricate us from every danger and difficulty. Indeed, few men choose to know their afflicted and persecuted acquaintance, which might expose them to expense, inconvenience, and peril; (Notes, xxxviii. 11, 12. Job vi. 15-23. xix. 5-22;) and refuge may in this sense fail us, and no one appear to care for our lives or souls. But the Lord will be the refuge of his people on earth, and their portion in heaven, that "land of the living." Thus he delivered David from his powerful persecutors, after he was brought very low; he raised him from the cave, in which he seemed to be imprisoned as a condemned criminal for execution: he advanced him to the throne, compassed him about with the righteous, dealt bountifully with him, and turned his complaining prayers into joyful praises. Thus he raised the crucified Redeemer, from the prison of the grave to the throne of glory, and made him head over all things, for his church. Thus the poor convinced sinner, when every other refuge fails, and he is shut up under sin, cries for help, and is brought forth out of prison to praise the Lord, in the company of his redeemed people: and thus every believer will be finally delivered from this evil world, from sin and death; that, with mutual congratulations, the whole company of the redeemed may rejoice, and praise their God and Saviour for evermore.

lest God should deal with him according to his sins, which he deprecates with such a deep sense of his unworthiness, that it hath made this to be numbered among the penitential psalms, and it is the last of them.' (Bp. Patrick.)—David had the faithfulness of God to depend on, according to the promises made to him by name, and to Solomon and his posterity by him, notwithstanding his personal unworthiness; and his cause was righteous, when called on to withstand Absalom's unnatural rebellion. (Notes, vii. 8-11. lxxi. 2. lxxxix. 1-4. 19-37. 2 Sam. vii. 12-16. 1 John i. 8-10.)

V. 2. The psalmist, having appealed to the justice of God, to decide betwixt him and his enemies, as well as his "faithfulness," to his promises, was reminded, that neither he, nor any other man, could stand in judgment before God, according to the tenour of his righteous law. 'The thoughts of such a trial are enough to appal the soul of the best man living, to make his flesh tremble, and all his bones shake, as if he stood at the foot of mount Sinai, and beheld JEHOVAH ready to break forth upon him, in the flame of devouring fire.' (Bp. Horne.)—'If thou shouldst proceed according to the rigour of thy law, the best man living (much less so great a sinner as I) will not be acquitted at thy tribunal.' (Bp. Patrick.)—The connection of this verse, with the preceding and the following verses, in which it is evident the psalmist was referring the cause, between him and his adversaries, to the decision of the just Judge of the world, renders it peculiarly important in the argument concerning a sinner's justification before God. (Notes, cxxx. 3, 4. Job iv. 17-21. Rom. iii. 19, 20. Gal. iii. 11-21.)

V. 3. Absalom, Ahithophel, and their zealous adherents, pursued David with unrelenting malice: they drove him from his city and palace, and at once turned his singular prosperity into desolation, almost like death; as a warrior at one stroke beats his enemy to the ground. Thus he was driven into obscure corners in disgrace and distress: and at the same time the consciousness of guilt, and inward disconsolation and temptation, served to shut him up, as in a dark dungeon; while the triumphs of his enemies made his cause to be considered as lost, so that he was no more noticed by the Israelites in general, than if he had been long dead. (Notes, vii. 3-5. xxxi. 10-13. lxxxviii. 5. 2 Sam. xv. 13-31.)

V. 4. (Notes, lxxviii. 3. cii. Title. cxlii. 1-3.)

V. 5. The psalmist may be supposed, in this extremity, to have revolved in his mind all the circumstances of his own eventful life, from the time when "the Lord delivered him from the paw of the lion and the bear," from the sword of Goliath, and the javelin of Saul, through all his subsequent persecutions, and every danger, till the time when he composed the psalm. But, it is also probable, that he meditated on all the displays of the power, truth, and mercy of God to his people, from the beginning of the world; in order to encourage his drooping hope and revive his desponding soul. (Notes, xlii. 6-8. lxxxv. 5-20. Is. li. 1-3. 9-11. lxxii. 7-14. Mic. vi. 3-5.)

V. 6. 'I long for relief, and expect it with as eager a desire, as the parched ground does for the refreshing shower.' (Bp. Patrick.)—"The joy of God's salvation," however, seems to have been more prominent in the psalmist's mind, than any outward deliverance, when he used this most striking similitude. (Notes, xlii. 1-3. lxxii. 1-4. lxxxiv. 1, 2. cxix. 81, 82. John vi. 37-39.)

V. 7. (Notes, 3. xlii. 1-4. lxi. 1-3. Is. lvi. 15, 16. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 8. 'Though this night be sad; yet let me hear...better news...in the morning.' (Bp. Patrick.) Perhaps this was written when David heard of Ahithophel's counsel to slay him. (Notes, iii. 2 Sam. xvii. 1-22.) In this emergency he earnestly lifted up his soul to God, and prayed to be directed what methods to adopt for his safety; or rather, how to act in consistency with his duty. (Notes, 10. Marg. Ref.)

V. 10. 'Whose guidance I beseech, as well as defence, that I may do nothing, (no, not for my preservation,) but what is perfectly agreeable to thy laws.' (Bp. Patrick.)—My God. (Notes, xxxi. 14. 2 Chr. xxviii. 5.)

Thy Spirit, &c. When we consider the darkness and pollution of the sinner's heart, and recollect how men "resist the Holy Spirit;" and how even believers

PSALM CXLIV.

David praises God for his goodness to him, and his condescension to the human race. 1-4. He prays for the powerful interposition of Jehovah to deliver him from his enemies. 5-8. He promises to praise God, 9, 10. He renews his prayers for personal and public prosperity, and shews the happiness of them "whose God is the Lord," 11-15.

often quench his emotions, grieve him by their perverseness, and pollute his temple by their sins; and also reflect, that he not only enters the soul as a sanctifier, to prepare us for future happiness; but as a comforter, and as the first-fruits of that happiness; and how he perseveres in his work of love and power, notwithstanding our folly and ingratitude; we shall perceive a peculiar propriety in this epithet of "good," as applied to God the Spirit. His condescension, compassion, and kindness can be equalled by nothing but the bleeding love of Emmanuel, and the mercy of God the Father in sending us such a redeemer and sanctifier. The "goodness" of the Spirit formed a very encouraging plea to the broken-hearted psalmist, who, conscious of his unworthiness, could scarcely hope, that this divine comforter, whom he had so shamefully grieved, would return any more to rejoice his drooping heart. (Notes li. 11-13. Neh. ix. 20. Is. xxvi. 10, 11. Marg. Ref.)

V. 11, 12. 'The verbs should be rendered in the future; and then the psalm will end as usual, with an act of faith and assurance, that all those mercies which have been asked shall be attained.' (Bp. Horne.) "For thy name's sake thou wilt quicken me," &c. (Notes, 1, 2. liv. 5. cxxxvi. 10-20. Marg. Ref.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The believer has not only the "faithfulness," but the "righteousness" of God engaged in his behalf; because he is "made the righteousness of God in Christ Jesus:" much more then may he be confident, that he has justice on his side in those causes which are pending betwixt him and his persecutors, before the supreme Judge. But he will not forget, that in himself, and in his best actions, he is a sinner, and that he cannot be justified at God's tribunal by his own obedience: and this consideration will keep him as a humble penitent, pleading guilty, crying for mercy, living by faith, and perceiving more and more preciousness in Christ to the end of his days. Nor need the trembling sinner, who hath lately discovered that he cannot stand in judgment before God, be discouraged on that account: for the greatest of saints have confessed the same. But what must be the presumption and delusion of those, who despise free grace, and expect heaven as the wages of their scanty formal services! Nay, strange to say, some of them have even arrogantly thought of meriting for others also!—The justified believer, having peace with God, will experience the enmity of the world, and the temptations of Satan. This enemy, at least, will persecute our souls; and he often smites our life to the ground by his seducing and discouraging suggestions. When he can prevail with us to commit sin, and the Lord is provoked to hide his face; he next insinuates that God will no more be gracious: and thus he causes us to indulge despondency and hard thoughts of God, and we dwell in darkness as if we were cast off to perish. But meditation and prayer will recover us from these distresses: whilst we "muse on the works of God," we shall be encouraged to hope in him; and then the mourning soul strives to return to him, as the infant stretches out its hands towards an indulgent mother; and thirsts for his consolations as the parched ground for refreshing rain. And if the imminent peril of death renders men vehement in calling out for speedy relief; much more will the believer call upon God, to hear him speedily, when "his spirit faileth," and, through the hiding of his face, he seems like them that go down into the pit. But this night of distress and discouragement shall usher in a morning of consolation and praise. They, who trust in the Lord, shall hear of his lovingkindness: and he will "cause those to know the way wherein they should walk, who lift up their souls unto him." Let us then flee to the Lord, to hide us from every enemy; intreating him to teach us to do his will, and to guide us by his good Spirit, in the straight way of holiness, to the land of perfect righteousness and peace. And the more we are slandered and persecuted, the more fervently should we pray, that we may not only find peace and comfort; but that "by well-doing we may put to silence the ignorance of foolish men." Nor will the good Spirit of our God disdain to be the guide, sanctifier, and comforter of those poor sinners, who seek these blessings in the Redeemer's name.—The Lord counts all those his enemies, who are enemies to his people; and, in mercy to their souls, he will cut off all that afflict and injure them: but we should especially seek the destruction of our sins, our worst enemies, that we may be more devotedly God's servants; and then his righteousness and mercy concur in securing an answer to our prayers for complete and eternal deliverance.

NOTES.

PSALM CXLIV. V. 1. This psalm was, no doubt, written by David after his accession to the throne over all Israel, and when he had gained some of his first victories over the neighbouring nations; but before he had finished his wars against them. (Note, 7-9.)—"Blessed be the LORD my strength," 'who of a poor shepherd has made me a valiant warrior and mighty conqueror.' (Notes, xli. 1-3. 2 Sam. xxii. 34, 35. Is. xli. 2-4. 2 Cor. x. 1-6.)

V. 2. (Note, 2 Sam. xxii. 2, 3. 31-33. 43-51.) My goodness. 'The God on whose goodness and mercy I depend; or, 'My supreme good; or, 'The author of all that is good in me.'—My deliverer unto me,' (the literal translation) for the prophet cannot satisfy himself with any words.

V. 3, 4. (Note, Ps. viii. 4-9. P. O. Heb. ii. 5-9. Marg. Ref.)—'Man is now become like vanity, or instability itself; his days are fleeting and transient as a shadow, which glides over the earth, vanishes, and is seen no more.'—Such was 'human nature; but the Son of God has taken it upon himself, rendered it immortal, and exalted it to heaven.' (Bp. Horne.)

'Now, what is man, when grace reveals

The virtue of a Saviour's blood?

Again a life divine he feels,

Despises earth, and walks with God

And what in yonder realms above,

Is ransomed man ordained to be?

With honour, holiness, and love,

No seraph more adorn'd than he.

Nearest the throne, and first in song,

Man shall his hallelujahs raise;

While wondering angels round him throng,

And swell the chorus of his praise.' (Olney Hymns.)

V. 5-8. The psalmist perceived that war was again preparing against him on every side; and the number and power of his enemies were so formidable, that, like a dreadful inundation, they seemed ready to bear down and swallow up all before them. (Notes, xciii. 3, 4. Is. viii. 6-8. Dan. ix. 25-27. Nah. i. 7, 8. Rev. xii. 13-17. xvii. 15-18.) But they were "strange children," aliens to Israel; so that their "mouth spake vanity, and their right hand was a right hand of iniquity;" they professed to be worshippers of idols, and blasphemed the God of Israel, and they employed themselves in working wickedness; nay, if they made any league, and confirmed it by giving the right hand as a token of amity, they made no scruple of breaking it. David, therefore, expected that God would appear for him against these idolaters, with similar tokens of his presence and power, as Israel had witnessed in Egypt, at the Red sea, and at mount Sinai. (Notes, 2 Sam. viii. 3-14. xxii. 7-16.)—The deliverance and victories that David expected and experienced from the immediate interposition of God, were typical of the Redeemer's resurrection and exaltation, in which the miraculous power of God was gloriously manifested; and also of his victories over those who oppose the universal establishment of his kingdom, and of his "putting all enemies under his feet;" of which event such passages may be considered as in some respects prophetic. (Notes, xviii. 49. 2 Sam. xxii. 43-51. P. O. 34-51.)

V. 9. (Note, xxxiii. 2, 3.)

V. 10. The preservation and success even of idolatrous princes, are, in Scripture, ascribed to God. "The Lord strengthened Egion against Israel."

there be "no breaking in, nor going out; that there be no complaining in our streets.

15 Happy is that people, that is in such a case; yea, happy is that people, whose God is the LORD.

PSALM CXLV.

David zealously praises the greatness, power, goodness, and mercy of God, 1-10. He celebrates the glory of his kingdom, and the bounty of his providence, 11-16; his justice, holiness, and regard to the prayers of the upright, and care of those that love him; and his vengeance upon the wicked, 17-21.

Dan. ii. 37. v. 18-24.)—“Thus saith the Lord to his anointed, to Cyrus, whose right hand I have holden, to subdue nations before him,” &c. (Notes, Is. xlv. 25-28. xlv. 1-6.)—“Though wicked kings be called God’s servants, for as much as he useth them to execute his judgments, yet David, because of God’s promise, and they that rule godly, are properly so called; because they serve not their own affections, but set forth God’s glory.”

V. 11. (Note, 5-8.) The word “rescue,” in the old translation, is more expressive than the term “rid,” for which it is exchanged.—Right hand. “When they shake hands with others, as if they were their friends, they intend thereby to deceive them.” (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 12-15. (Notes, Lev. xxvi. 1-13. Deut. xxviii. 1-14.) The prosperity of Israel, according to the promises of the national covenant, was one great end for which David was raised to the throne; and, in all his undertakings and successes, he kept this in view. When the surrounding idolaters were subdued, Israel would be at peace; and being united under the equitable administration of a pious king, they would adhere to the worship of God, and, by his blessing, they would multiply exceedingly. Their sons would grow as plants in a fruitful soil, in vigour and courage, to be the stability of the country; and their daughters, prudent, virtuous, healthful, industrious, and amiable, fitted to fill the important relations of wives and mothers, would be the ornament of their families, and of those into which they were married, and the bond of union betwixt them, as polished corner-stones both beautify and connect together the parts of a magnificent structure. (Notes, Prov. xxxi. 13-31.) Having peace abroad, and harmony at home, their land, being well cultivated, might be expected to be very productive in corn, wine, oil, and every thing valuable, and their cattle to multiply exceedingly. No invader would break in among them; none would go forth into captivity, or be induced to emigrate; nor would there be any complaining of oppression or penury in their streets. These were the blessings engaged to Israel, whilst they adhered to the service of JEHOVAH, and of which David hoped to put them in possession. In the ordinary course of providence, they are generally conferred upon nations where princes and people unite in maintaining the worship of God, and obedience to his laws; and they are also typical of those blessings which the Son of David bestows upon his faithful subjects.—“If God give not to his children all these blessings, yet he recompenseth them with better things.” (Notes, xxxiii. 10-12. lxxv. 9-13. lxxix. 11, 12. cxlvi. 5.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

If men become eminent for those things, to which they were not regularly educated, and for which they have wanted many advantages, and which are of real value; they should be the more deeply sensible, that God himself hath been their teacher. Courage, strength, and military skill indeed are gifts of the Creator, and all success is from him: yet they are seldom so used, as to warrant the successful warrior to say, “The LORD, my strength, hath taught my hands to war, and my fingers to fight:” for, alas! too frequently “the great murderer from the beginning instigates ambitious, revengeful, and rapacious men, to destroy their fellow-creatures without cause. But they who are really disposed to give God the glory of their endowments and success, will seek grace from him to make a proper use of them; and praise him as “their goodness,” and their merciful God, more than as their fortress, their protector, and the giver of their authority and prosperity. Happy are they whom the Lord teaches to “fight the good fight of faith,” and to whom he gives that noblest victory and rule, the conquest and dominion over their own spirits! (Notes, Prov. xvii. 32. xxv. 28. 1 Tim. v. 11, 12.) In the highest earthly exaltation, they will still recollect, how mean, sinful, and vile they are in themselves; they will be filled with admiring gratitude for the condescension of the great God to such rebellious sinners, and for every instance of his regard to them; and thus they will be preserved from self-importance and presumption in prosperity. They will not forget that “man is like unto vanity, his days are as a shadow, that passeth away;” (Note, cii. 15-18;) that the transition from a throne to the grave, or even to the depths of hell, is easy and frequent; that deliverance from the wrath to come, and a crown of unfading glory, are infinitely the most important concerns; and that living to the honour of God, and the benefit of his church, is far more desirable than all human exaltation and renown. Even in this life, success and authority rather expose men to trials and conflicts, than secure exemption from them. But whilst we are doing the duty of our station, we may depend on God to defend and prosper us: and when our enemies are infidel, impious, or licentious, our encouragement to hope in him for help against them may proportionably increase. He, “who bows the heavens and comes down,” and “touches the mountains and causes them to smoke,” to melt, or remove, can find innumerable ways to confound the devices, dissolve the confederacies, and scatter the forces of his most potent foes; to deliver his people from dangers, as imminent, as if they were sinking in the depths of the ocean; and thus to turn all their fears and prayers into new songs of joyful praise. He giveth temporal deliverances to kings, and continueth, or restoreth, their health, in answer to the prayers, or for the benefit, of their people; and he alone can give them eternal salvation, which they as much need as the meanest of their subjects, whilst they are commonly placed more out of the way of it: and yet to be saved from the hurtful sword, or the wasting sickness, without being delivered from the dominion of sin, and “the wrath to come,” is no very enviable advantage.—The higher any one is placed in society, the more entirely ought he to seek the public good, in preference to his own personal emolument or indulgence; yet how very seldom is this undeniable truth, duly and practically considered! No war ought to be undertaken, no victories desired, but for the sake of securing peace, the blessings of which are far more valuable than the most brilliant successes; to say nothing of the thousands who are slain in war, and who too generally die in their sins.—Wise, equitable, and pious princes and magistrates conduce much to the prosperity of nations; for such blessings we should pray, and when granted we should return thanks for them, as well as for our liberty, plenty, and other public benefits. It is a very pleasant sight to behold a nation increasing in population; families brought up in industry, honesty, and plenty, and fitted for their several stations in public and domestic life; not cut off by war, or wasted by famine, or pestilence; and when all manner of abundance is stored in our garners, and clothes our fields and pastures. In many of these things we are a happy people; yet, alas! our numerous youth do not generally afford a pleasing prospect. Too many of the young men of all ranks in this favoured land, grow up noxious plants, being early debauched in their principles and morals, and justly to be denominated infidel, profane, licentious, and dissipated; contracting and disseminating both mental and bodily diseases; and prepared to communicate vice, and ruin, and enfeebled constitutions, to the next generation. The daughters of the land are indeed sufficiently polished with exterior beauty and embellishment, and every superficial accomplishment; but few of them have the polishing of a corner-stone, as qualified to be the ornament of families, the cement of society, and a blessing to the land, and to the next generation, by an attentive, judicious, and virtuous performance of the duties of domestic life; and still fewer are possessed of that adorning, which the word of God almost exclusively recommends. Whilst we abound in luxury and excess, and are free from the irruptions of invaders, and the oppression of tyrants, there is still much complaining in our streets, yea, much extreme distress, through the vice, sloth, and extravagance which prevail among the lower ranks in society, and through the enormous encouragement by the affluent to those worthless minions who minister to their amusements, decorations, or excesses; attended with the neglect of the honest and industrious poor. Thus in proportion as we do not adhere to the worship and service of God, we cease to be a happy people, notwithstanding all our advantages. But there is a considerable remnant of another character, the subjects of the Son of David; who share the blessings of his authority, and the fruits of his victories; and are a happy people, because “they have the LORD for their God.” They dwell among the ungodly, as among “strange children, whose mouth speaketh of vanity, and whose right hand worketh iniquity:” but they desire to be preserved from the contagion of their example. Their happiness is not placed in outward prosperity, nor even in flourishing families: but their endeavours are used, and their prayers offered daily, that “their sons may in their youth” be planted and grow up “in the courts of the LORD,” that their daughters may be an ornamental part of God’s spiritual temple, and be fitted in due time to be mothers in Israel, to train up a godly seed for the ensuing generation; that the number of Christians may increase, as the flocks in the fertile pastures of Canaan; that they who labour in the word and doctrine, may be strong in the faith of our Lord Jesus Christ, (Note, 1 Cor. ix. 7-12;) that the good seed of the word may yield a vast increase; that persecutions, heresies, and divisions may be terminated; and that the church may be in peace, and prosper, without any murmurings, envyings, or contentions, to disgrace and weaken the cause of Christianity. These objects may we ever keep in view, that, as one united phalanx, all who love Christ, may oppose the irruption of infidelity and iniquity, and promote the diffusion of truth and righteousness; for “happy are the people, that is in such a case; yea, happy is that people, whose God is the LORD.”

NOTES.

PSALM CXLV. Title. “Praise from David.” From this psalm to the end of the book, we find unmingled praise and thanksgiving, without one complaint or petition. Probably David composed all these psalms towards the close of his life; when, as the setting sun breaks forth from behind intervening clouds, he shone forth, and set in mild majesty and splendour: anticipating the employment and felicity of heaven, as he approached the mansions of the blessed. (Note, 1 Chr. xxix. 26-28. P. O. 20-30.) The psalm is composed alphabetically, each verse beginning with one of the Hebrew letters, in order, except that min is omitted.

V. 1, 2. (Notes, xlv. 1-7. xlvii. 1-9.) The words rendered in these verses, “for ever and ever,” are peculiarly emphatical, and imply endless duration, if human language can convey that idea. Accordingly the Septuagint translate the benefits which they have received, the inheritance prepared for them, and the price paid for their ransom, form their favourite topics. Fain would they

"make known to all the sons of men his mighty acts," and "the glorious majesty of his kingdom:" that none might any longer refuse submission to so gracious a prince, whose authority is established to all generations. The Lord's condescension likewise excites their liveliest gratitude; he regardeth the mean and the vile; he upholdeth all such as feel themselves falling into sin and misery, and apply to him for help; and he raiseth up all those who are bowed down with conscious guilt, or deep distress. All creatures wait upon him, and are satisfied with meat in due season; and he saith to his believing poor, "Your Father knoweth what things you have need of." (Notes, Matt. vi. 25-32. Luke xii. 32-34.) His justice and purity are always exercised in full perfection, whether he save or punish; yet he most delighteth that sinners should repent and live. He is therefore accessible at all times, and in all places, to the most guilty of our fallen race; and he is high to hear, to pardon, and to save, all who call upon him in truth; so that none who hear the gospel are excluded from its blessings, but profane despisers, careless transgressors, and hypocrites. "For he will fulfil the desire of them that fear him; he will hear their cry, and will help them." And, having taught them to love his name and his holy ways, he will preserve them from the destruction of the wicked, who shall perish for ever. (Note, 1 Pet. i. 1-5.) May we then fear his wrath, and seek his grace; may we love his name, and walk in his ways; then shall we speak from a full heart, whilst our lips utter his praise; and whilst we desire that "all flesh should bless his holy name for ever and ever."

NOTES.

PSALM CXLVI. V. 1. The Septuagint and the vulgate Latin ascribe this psalm to Haggai and Zechariah; from an opinion, perhaps, that it suited the times of those prophets; when the Jews found little encouragement to trust in the kings of Persia; but when simply trusting in God, they were prospered.—It is, however, far more probable that it was written by David, towards the close of his reign. It begins and ends with the word "Hallelujah." (Note, ciii. 20-22.)

V. 2. (Note, cxlv. 1, 2.) No doubt the following stanza gives the genuine meaning of the psalmist:—

'I'll praise my Maker with my breath;
And when my voice is lost in death,
Praise shall employ my nobler powers:
My days of praise shall ne'er be past
While life and thought and being last,
And immortality endures.' (Watts.)

V. 3, 4. If he, who commonly styled himself "the Son of man," had not also been the Son of God, he must have been included in this general dissuasive; but on the contrary, the particulars mentioned in the subsequent part of the psalm, were remarkably verified in him.—Earthly princes, if they have the will, often want the power, even to protect their friends. And should they want neither will nor power to advance them; yet, still all depends upon the breath in their nostrils, which, perhaps, at the very critical moment, goeth forth, they return to their earth; and all the thoughts of those, who hoped to rise by their means, fall into the same grave, and are buried with them for ever. (Bp. Horne.)—How often is this exemplified in this land, by the disappointed expectations of those, who are strongly attached to this or the other eminent statesman, and are confident of preferment from him; but he dies, and their hopes expire with him. ## PSALM CXLVII.

Exhortations to praise God for the wisdom, power, and goodness displayed in providence, and in the care of his church; and in the changes of the weather, and the revolving seasons; and for giving Israel his word and ordinances, 1-20.

2 The LORD doth build up Jerusalem ; <sup>d</sup>he gathereth together the outcasts of Israel.

V. 8. 'This verse was most exactly fulfilled in our Lord Christ, when he came to give salvation to us.' (Bp. Patrick.)—So indeed are all the rest, both in respect of his miracles, and the spiritual blessings of his salvation. (Notes, xi. 7. cxlv. 14. Is. xxix. 17-19. xxxv. 5-7. Matt. xi. 2-6. Acts xxvi. 16-18.)

V. 9. (Notes, i. 4-6. cxlv. 19, 20. Job v. 8-16. Acts xvii. P. O. 1-9. (Marg. Ref.)—Strangers, &c. 'Meaning all that are destitute of worldly means and succour.' (Notes, lxxviii. 5. Deut. x. 18, 19.)

V. 10. 'He assurareth the church, that God reigneth for ever, for the preservation of the same.' (Notes, x. 16. cxlv. 9-13. Is. xii. 4-6. lii. 7, 8. Rev. xi. 15-18.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

In heaven, when one Hallelujah closes, another commences: and sometimes the believer on earth is so carried above his fears, sorrows, and sins, as to emulate the incessant thanksgivings of "the saints in light."—If we desire to praise the Lord while we live, as our most delightful occupation, we shall certainly praise him "while we have any being," even to all eternity. With these glorious prospects before our eyes, how mean do the pursuits of ambition, or connection with the great, seem to us! and how needful does it appear to dissuade men from this common, but destructive, idolatry! The fickleness, jealousies, selfishness and weakness of man, and the intrigues and cabals of courts, render all dependence on princes delusory, even as to this present world. But were this dependence as stable as it is slippery, the uncertainty of life must expose, to perpetual anxieties and disappointments, all those who confide in such dying patrons. How little then could the friendship of all the princes of the earth do for us, in respect of judgment and the eternal world! "Happy is he," alone, "who hath the God of Jacob for his help, and whose hope is in the LORD his God." He who "made the heaven, and earth, the sea, and all that therein is," cannot want power to bless us; and his goodness is illustrious in every part of his providential government. But lest we should question his love to sinners, or his eternal truth and faithfulness to his word, behold, the God of heaven assumes our human flesh, that he may "become our salvation!" (Notes, Is. xii. 1-3.) The eternal and coequal Son of God becomes "the Son of man!" Not to be without help, as the other children of men are, but to bring effectual help and eternal salvation unto us. And though he expired upon the cross for our sins, and was laid in the grave; yet his glorious and gracious thoughts of love did not then perish, but he arose again to accomplish them; and he reigneth in Zion, her Lord and King, to all generations, to the praise and glory of God the Father; and when we trust in Emmanuel, then our faith and hope are rested on the God of Jacob. (Note, 1 Pet. i. 17-21.) To evince, that he was the Creator and Lord of all, when in his state of humiliation on earth; he rescued those who were oppressed by Satan, and executed judgment on that oppressor; he created food to bestow on the hungering multitudes; he opened the eyes of those who had been born blind; he raised up those who were bowed with disease; and he shewed himself the effectual friend of the widow and of the destitute. But all this was only a specimen and an emblem of what he was doing every day. He still continually proclaims, and grants, "deliverance to the captives, and the opening of the prison to those that are bound," in the chains of sin and Satan. He opens the eyes of our understandings, and raises up those who are bowed down with a load of conscious guilt, or by great distress of soul; he feeds those, who hunger for salvation, with the bread of life; and he is the constant friend of "the poor in spirit," of the destitute and helpless. In short, "he loveth the righteous," and their righteousness is in and from him; "but the way of the wicked he turneth upside down:" and whilst he doeth these things by his grace, his providence ordereth all things for the good of those who trust and love him. Let sinners then flee to him; and let believers rejoice in him, as their gracious and covenanted friend: and as "the LORD shall reign for ever, even our God to all generations," let us without ceasing excite each other to praise his holy name.

NOTES.

PSALM CXLVII. V. 1, 2. (Notes, xxxiii. 1. lxiii. 5, 6. xcii. 1, 2. cxxxv. 3.) This psalm also is, by the Septuagint, ascribed to Haggai and Zechariah: and indeed many expressions in it favour the supposition, that it was composed as a song of praise for the restoration of the Jews to Jerusalem and their own land.

3 He <sup>h</sup>healeth the broken in heart, and bindeth up their wounds.

7 <sup>S</sup>Sing unto the LORD with thanksgiving; sing praise upon the harp unto our God;

8 Who <sup>c</sup>covereth the heaven with clouds, who <sup>p</sup>repareth rain for the earth, who maketh grass to grow upon the mountains.

9 He <sup>g</sup>iveth to the beast his food, and to the young ravens which cry.

11 The LORD <sup>t</sup>aketh pleasure in them <sup>t</sup>hat fear him, in those that hope in his mercy.

but it seems better suited to the times of Nehemiah, when the walls were rebuilt, and the state re-established, than to the unsettled condition of the newly returned captives, when Haggai and Zechariah prophesied to them. For in their days, it could scarcely be said, that the Lord built up Jerusalem, as he had not then "strengthened the bars of her gates."—(Notes, Neh. i. 3. iii. iv. vi. 15, 16. xii. 27—43. Dan. ix. 25—27. Marg. Ref.)—Outcasts, (2.) (Note, Is. lvi. 8.)—This psalm also begins and ends with "Hallelujah."

V. 3. <sup>H</sup>e comforts us after our long sorrow, which had in a manner broken our hearts;—and hath in some measure repaired our breaches, which like a festering wound, endangered the life of our nation. (Bp. Patrick) (Notes, Job v. 18, 19. Is. i. 5, 6. lxi. 1—3. Hos. vi. 1—3.)

V. 4, 5. <sup>T</sup>hough it seem to man incredible, that God should assemble his church, being so dispersed; yet nothing can be too hard for him, that can number and name all the stars.—This thought naturally arose from the dispersed state of the Jews after the captivity, and was applicable to the Lord's gathering them into their own land. (Am. ix. 9.)—<sup>H</sup>e who does this, (number and name the stars,) cannot be ignorant of the circumstances and situation of his elect. (Bp. Horne.) (Notes, cxxxix. 17, 18. cxlv. 3, 4. Job xi. 7—12. Is. xl. 25—31. Am. v. 7—9. Rom. xi. 33—36.)

V. 6—8. (Notes, cxlv. 14. cxlvi. 8. (Marg. Ref.)—Clouds, &c. 'Clouds look melancholy; yet without them we could have no rain, and consequently no fruit: thus afflictions look black, and dark, and unpleasant; yet from them come those showers that "yield the peaceable fruit of righteousness." (Henry.)—(Notes, lxxv. 9—13. civ. 13—15. cxxxv. 7. 1 Kings xviii. 43—45. Job. v. 8—16. xxxvii. 27—33. Jer. xiv. 19—22.)

V. 10, 11. <sup>W</sup>e need not be afraid though we are of little force, and have no armies of horse and foot to defend us: for the LORD who fights for us hath no need of these, (Neh. iv. 20;) and will not take part with our enemies, because they are superior to us in the strength of their horses, and the nimbleness of their soldiers. But he delights to give those his assistance, who, worshipping him devoutly, fear to offend him; and having no help in themselves, nor any earthly refuge to flee to, depend notwithstanding with a steadfast faith on his infinite mercy. (Bp. Patrick.) (xxxiii. 18. (Note, cxlix. 4. Marg. Ref.)

V. 12—14. The Jews celebrated the dedication of the wall, (when it had been rebuilt, and the gates of it set up, under the pious care of Nehemiah,) with loud and earnest thanksgivings to God; (Notes, Neh. xii. 27—43;) and they were encouraged in future to hope confidently for peace and plenty.—The last clause is literally, "He shall satisfy thee with the fat of wheat." (Notes, Deut. xxxii. 14. Matt. xiv. 15—21.) (Marg. Ref.)

V. 15—18. (Note, 2 Thess. iii. 1—5.) (Marg. Ref.) Till the Lord's time came, all the efforts of the Jews, to recover liberty or prosperity, were as unavailing, as the skill and power of man are, to prevent the effects of frost and snow: but when he gave the command, every heart was speedily disposed to favour them; as the snow and ice melt, and the waters flow, when he sends a thaw, warm sunbeams, and a southern breeze. 'What the sun is to the world, the same is Christ to the church. When the heart of man turns away from him, then darkness succeeds to light; then faith fails, and all its fair productions wither, and the fertilizing streams of charity are frozen to the bottom. But when he sendeth out his word, and bloweth with his Spirit,—then faith revives, the hearts of men are warmed, and their understandings illuminated. (Bp. Horne.) The snow is here compared to "wool," and the ice, to "morsels;" and it is well known that the snow keeps the ground warm, and assists vegetation: so that, perhaps the ice, or hailstones, are compared to "morsels," not only from the solid form which they assume; but because of the nourishing and fertilizing effects which the frost produceth upon the ground.

V. 19, 20. (Notes, lxxviii. 3—5. Deut. iv. 6—8. 32—40. xxxiii. 45. Rom. iii. 1, 2. ix. 4. 5. Eph. ii. 11—13.) The pious Jews, when returned from their dispersions among idolaters, would be more impressed with the value of their sacred oracles, and other special advantages, than they were who had never witnessed such scenes of darkness and ignorance.—This psalm also begins and ends with Hallelujah.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The display of the glory of the Divine perfections was intended in all the works of God; (Notes, Pron. xvi. 4. Eph. i. 9—12;) and to celebrate his praises forms the most suitable return for his benefits, of which we are capable. It is therefore both reasonable and acceptable, pleasant and becoming, for us to abound in this blessed work; 'which is the offspring of gratitude, and the expression of love; the elevation of the soul, and the antepast of heaven; its own reward in this life, and an introduction to the felicity of the next.' (Bp. Horne.)—The continued care of God over his chosen city, and in gathering his people Israel from their various captivities and dispersions, to dwell and worship at Jerusalem, were emblems of his care of his church, the city of the living God; of his gathering poor outcast sinners by his grace, to dwell there on earth; and of his bringing them all at length to his holy habitation in heaven.—The contrast between the majesty and the mercy of our God, should never be overlooked. Whilst <sup>h</sup>he telleth the number of the stars, <sup>h</sup>he condescendeth to hear the poor broken-hearted sinner, and to heal by his consolations the wounded spirit. His greatness, power, and wisdom are infinite; and he displays his justice in crushing to the earth the haughtiest and mightiest rebels: yet he lifteth up the meek from their dejection and abject misery, to the comfort of his favour here, and to the throne of glory hereafter. He provides for all creatures, by means worthy of himself; and whilst he "feeds the young ravens who cry unto him," he gives a pledge that he will not leave destitute his praying people. He delighteth not in those things in which sinners confide and glory: but his delight is in them who conscientiously fear and serve him, hoping in his mercy alone for pardon and acceptance. (Note, Jer. ix. 23, 24.) These are the inhabitants of Zion, who praise his name: he is their protector, and will bless them, and their children, with spiritual peace and abundant supplies of every good thing; whilst they who trust in chariots and horses, or in their own agility, strength, wisdom, courage, or righteousness, will sink into penury, misery, and contempt.—When the Lord speaks, all nature prepares for prompt obedience. At his command the snow and the hoar-frost irresistibly cover the earth; nothing can withstand his piercing and congealing cold; the rivers are arrested in their course, and the works of men are suspended; nor can any human power remove the obstruction. But JEHOVAH again gives the word—the gentler breezes blow, the snow and ice melt, the waters flow, and all reverts to its former course. Let us then consider how unable we are to stand before the indignation of the Lord: let us be thankful that he moderates the continuance of the winter, and renders it useful to the earth: let us bless him, if abundance of all things needful renders us free from the miseries which many suffer during that inclement season; and let us learn to contribute liberally to their relief. Let us also expect from his power things impracticable to all others. He can comfort and sanctify, when every human effort hath proved unsuccessful: he can soften and melt the most obdurate heart; and bring the rich and great into his church, though that is more difficult than for a camel to go through the eye of a needle. (Notes, Matt. xix. 23—26. Jam. i. 9—11.) Whilst therefore we remember with gratitude, that he hath shewed his word unto us, and favoured us with his statutes and judgments, as he did Jacob of old; whilst we are watchful not to abuse these privileges to our deeper condemnation, and study to shew forth his praises in our holy lives, let us also pity, hope, and pray for those who are not so dealt with, and who have not known his judgments; for the Lord is able to remove every obstruction to their conversion, that all nations may join in his solemn worship, and praise him as the God of Israel.

unutterable heights, where hosts of immortal spirits, admitted to the sight of their King, enjoy unfading pleasures, the song is to begin. And when the strain is thus set by the celestial part of the choir, it is to be taken up and echoed back, by the creatures of this lower world, animate and inanimate, which have all their several parts assigned them, in the great work of glorifying their Creator.' (Bp. Horne.)

V. 3. (Notes, Ps. xix. 1-6.) 'The material heavens, with the luminaries placed in them, &c.; by their splendour and their influences, all regulated according to the ordinance of their Maker, do, in a very intelligible and striking manner, declare the glory of God: they call upon us to translate their actions into our language, and copy their obedience in our lives.' (Bp. Horne.)—(Marg. Ref.)

V. 6. (Notes, civ. 6-9. Gen. viii. 20-22. Job xxxviii. 4-11. Is. liv. 6-10.)

V. 7-12. From the earth. The preceding praises were to be rendered from the heavens above; the following from the earth beneath. (Marg. Ref.)—'Dragons;' whales and other sea monsters. (Notes, lxxiv. 13-17. civ. 25, 26. Gen. i. 20-25.)

V. 13. 'Let them praise the incomparable wisdom, goodness, and power of the Lord...whose most excellent majesty infinitely surpasses all, that the earth or the heavens can tell us of him.' (Bp. Patrick.)—It ought not to pass unnoticed, that this verse is future. 'They shall praise,' &c.; and may be considered as a prediction of that time, when 'the earth shall be full of the glory of the LORD, as the waters cover the sea.' (Note, Hab. ii. 12-14.)

V. 14. The horn, &c. Or, 'He will exalt a horn for his people:—' 'He hath raised up for us a horn of salvation, in the house of his servant David; as he spake by the mouth of his holy prophets, which have been since the world began.' (Note, Luke i. 67-75.)—'He hath set over us a powerful prince, for the defence and safety of his people; whose fame he hath hereby raised to the highest pitch of honour.' (Bp. Patrick.) But David was only a shadow of him, who is 'a Light to lighten the Gentiles, and the glory of his people Israel.' (Note, Luke ii. 25-32. Marg. Ref.)—This psalm also opens and concludes with 'Hallelujah.'

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Every effort of the zealous believer to praise the Lord, causes his boundless excellencies to unveil themselves more fully to his enraptured, admiring, thankful heart: and thus he becomes more and more conscious of his inability to praise his God in a suitable manner. He therefore rejoices to reflect, that there are innumerable hosts of angels before the throne, in the heights of heaven, who are able to praise him in more exalted strains: and though they need no incitement, yet his desire that God should be worthily glorified, will make him ready to call on them to proceed in their lofty adorations: and he would wish, if it were possible, that the sound of their praises might be heard on earth, and echoed back in responsive chorus by all its inhabitants. Indeed, all the works of God, above and below, (fallen rational creatures excepted,) without our exhortations, do in their way proclaim the Creator's praise; and it is worthy of notice, that men, who do not praise the Lord and obey his command, are more ungovernable than the monsters of the deep, than the raging sea itself, than the stormy wind, or the devouring flame!—But how desirable would it be, if kings of the earth, and all princes, nobles, and rulers would count it their honour to lead the chorus of praise to the Lord, and use all their authority in promoting his glory! and if all people would unite in this service! How reasonable and becoming would it be, for 'young men and maidens,' to employ the fire and vigour of their active spirits, and to seek their pleasure and joy, in doing the will and celebrating the praises of the Lord: and for the aged to shew that they

8 To bind their kings with chains, and their nobles with fetters of iron;

P S A L M C L.

Repeated calls to praise God for his glorious excellencies and mighty acts, with all kind of musical instruments, and the concurrence of all that breathe, 1-6.

2 Praise him 'for his mighty acts: praise him according to his excellent greatness.

3 Praise him 'with the sound of the 'trumpet: praise him with 'the psaltery and harp.

4 Praise him 'with the timbrel and 'dance: praise him with 'stringed instruments and 'organs.

5 Praise him upon 'the loud cymbals: praise him upon the high sounding cymbals.

6 'Let every thing that hath breath praise the LORD. Praise ye the LORD.

THE BOOK OF PROVERBS.

Immediately after the prophetic and devotional compositions of David, we enter on the writings of his son Solomon, whose character and actions have already been considered. In the sacred historian's account of Solomon's extraordinary wisdom and knowledge, it is said, that "he spake three thousand proverbs, and his songs were a thousand and five; and he spake of trees, from the cedar-tree that is in Lebanon, even to the hyssop that springeth out of the wall; he spake also of beasts, and of fowl, and of creeping things, and of fishes." (1 Kings iv. 32, 33.) No more, however, has been preserved of his writings, than the books of Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, and Canticles, or Solomon's Song; (except a few psalms which seem to have been composed by him:) these alone, it is probable, being calculated for the religious instruction of mankind, and sufficient for the purpose of attractive variety, in a revelation, the whole of which was intended, by the wisdom of God, to be distinguished, and adapted to general usefulness, by comprehensive brevity. In respect of the book before us, we may suppose, that the selection contained in it was made in part by Solomon himself, in his old age, from his other works; and the rest by the men of Hezekiah, namely, those prophets whom that pious prince consulted; and among these were Hosea and Micah, and especially Isaiah. We may therefore assuredly conclude, that it was conducted under the superintending inspiration of the Holy Spirit. Indeed, the express quotations from this book, or most evident references to it, in the New Testament, constitute the fullest proof that our Lord and his apostles considered it, not merely as the work of a very wise man, but as a part of the oracles of God. For satisfaction on this point, let the reader compare the following passages. (iii. 11, 12. with Heb. xii. 5, 6.—iii. 34. with Jam. iv. 6. and 1 Pet. v. 5.—x. 12. with Jam. v. 20. and 1 Pet. iv. 8; xxv. 6, 7. with Luke xiv. 8, 10.—xxv. 21, 22. with Rom. xii. 20.—and xxvii. 1. with Jam. iv. 13.) Many more evident references might be shewn; but these are sufficient for the purpose.—The original name of this book is Mesalim, which seems to signify authoritative maxims, or maxims of high estimation and authority: and a great part of it is made up of detached aphorisms, containing most important practical instruction. —'The proverbs generally consist of two sentences, joined in a kind of antithesis, the second being sometimes a reduplication, sometimes an explanation, and sometimes an opposition' (or contrast) 'to the sense of the first. This style of composition produces great beauty in many other parts of Scripture, where it is employed for poetical arrangement.'—'The wisdom of all ages, from the highest antiquity, has chosen to compress its lessons into compendious sentences, which were peculiarly adapted to the simplicity of earlier times, which are readily conceived and easily retained; and which circulate in society as useful principles, to be unfolded and applied as occasion may require.'—'Solomon's Proverbs are so justly founded on the principles of human nature, and so adapted to the permanent interests of man, that they agree with the manners of every age, and may be assumed as the rules for the direction of our conduct, in every condition and rank of life.' (Grey.)—'It was usual for wise men of old, when their observation lighted upon any thing that might prove beneficial in common life, to reduce it immediately, and contract it into some short sentence....The great antiquity of this sententious way of speaking is apparent enough from the passage of David's, "As saith the proverb of the ancients, Wickedness proceedeth from the wicked." (1 Sam. xxiv. 13.) (Bp. Patrick.)—Indeed, such short maxims, comprehending much instruction in few words, and carrying their own evidence with them, are well suited to direct the conduct, without overburdening the memory, or perplexing the mind with abstract reasonings; and there are in all countries old proverbs, or common sayings, which have great authority and influence on the opinions and actions of mankind. Such maxims, however, want their proper basis, namely, the sanction of a divine original; and being generally the mere result of worldly prudence, are too often calculated to impose on the judgment, and mislead those who are directed by them. But the proverbs of this book are not only far more ancient than any others extant in the world; but they have also received a divine imprimatur, and are infallible rules to direct our conduct in every circumstance of human life: and we shall perceive the meaning and utility of them, in proportion to our experience in true religion, our acquaintance with our own hearts and with human nature, and the extent and accuracy of our observation on the characters and affairs of men.—It has also been made evident by the learned, that several persons among the heathen, who acquired reputation by framing or collecting proverbs, enriched their works from the treasury before us, nay, drew from it their most valuable materials. It would be unreasonable to expect direct prophecies in a composition of this nature: and though we shall not lose sight of Christ, and his truths and precepts, we should by no means endeavour to find out the peculiar doctrines of the Gospel, in every part of the book. These must be learned from those portions of Scripture which treat more expressly on them: and having our hearts enlivened in communion with God, by meditation on those devotional exercises which we have just closed, we may here be instructed how "to walk in wisdom towards them that are without;" to live in this evil world without being entangled or polluted by it; and to pursue our eternal interests, and our present peace and holiness, in connection with the honour of God, and the benefit of the church and of the world; so that it would be very useful for those, who can command their time, at some stated season every day, to read, and deliberately consider, a few of these maxims, with reference to their own conduct in the various affairs in which they are concerned.—The book seems not to have been all written at any one period of Solomon's life, but from time to time as circumstances occurred. It is however, probable, that the first nine Chapters were framed, as an introduction to the whole, towards the close of his days. This is reckoned the first part of the book, or the preface to it. The second part extends from the beginning of the tenth chapter, to the seventeenth verse of the twenty-second; and more strictly speaking contains the Proverbs. In the third part, which reaches to the end of the twenty-fourth chapter, the sacred writer again addresses his son or scholar, as present, with more connected exhortations.—The fourth part consists of Proverbs collected by the men of Hezekiah, and reaches to the end of the twenty-ninth chapter. And the last two chapters, which bear the names of Agur and Lemuel, are regarded as the fifth part, and will be considered more properly, in the exposition.—There can be no doubt, but the whole, or the greater part, of the book is a poetical composition: yet, the nature and rules of Hebrew poetry are at present so little understood, that every attempt to alter the original, or to interpret its meaning, by reasons deduced from the metre, must to the serious mind be entirely unsatisfactory.

V. 6. Dark sayings. (Note, Ps. lxxviii. 2.) The word signifies riddles, or enigmas, which of old were used, not for amusement, but to impress important instructions the more deeply on the minds of those who studied to unriddle them.

V. 7. (Note, Ps. cxi. 10.) 'There is not such a wise instruction to be found in all their books, (those of the most admired pagan writers,) as the very first of all in Solomon's, "The fear of the LORD is the beginning of wisdom;" without which men are but fools, and, having no regard to their Creator, will despise the wisest instructions.' (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 8. Perhaps Solomon meant to address himself to his son Rehoboam, exhorting him to regard the instructions and rules, which he had received in his education, as most ornamental to him. It is, however, a general exhortation to young persons to receive the instructions, and submit to the authority, of their parents, as the surest method, in subserviency to the fear of God, of obtaining the esteem and respect of all wise men.—The appellation "my son," may also be considered as the language of that authority and affection, which should unite in a public teacher of religion.—'And not only hearken to thy father, when he teaches thee to fear God; but let thy mother's commands be a law unto thee, especially when she bids thee observe the directions of thy public instructors. The second step to wisdom is, next to God, to bear great reverence to parents, both natural and spiritual; to God's ministers, to whom, if children be not bred to give a great regard, they seldom prove virtuous.—It is very observable how much human laws differ from the divine: the former generally only providing that due regard be given by children to their fathers, but taking no notice of mothers. But God in his law takes care to preserve a just reverence both to father and mother equally.' (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 9. Young persons too generally seek notice and admiration by external decorations, and vain ostentation in divers ways; while they neglect both the fear of God, and respectful obedience to their parents and superiors; which are vastly more becoming, and more valuable in the judgment of all wise men.

V. 10-14. This transition seems to imply an instruction to parents, as to the counsels and warnings which they should give their children. Combinations among individuals for carrying on a kind of private war, either within the community or against the adjacent territories, have been common in many ages and countries; and have not exposed men to that stigma which highway robberies and murders do, in countries governed by a stricter police. The unreasonable and disproportionate reputation acquired by military valour and conduct, has often caused such exploits to be considered as proofs of a man of spirit, and opportunities of acquiring, or displaying, a capacity for war and victory, as well as of making a fortune; and the blood shed in them to be considered as a thing of course. Just as the murder committed in duels, by men who call pride and revenge the point of honour, is not considered as so atrocious a crime as murder is in other circumstances; nay, sometimes it adds to a man's reputation, in defiance indeed of common sense and Scripture. When therefore, a young man, destitute of the fear of God, and weary of subjection to prudent parents, was secretly persuaded to make an inroad on the neighbouring countries, or to lay wait for the companies of travellers or merchants, and, without cause or provocation, to shed their blood, and enrich himself with their plunder, he would not in general be very scrupulous, but consider the attempt as a kind of military expedition. This might easily be shewn to have been the case, by innumerable extracts from ancient history. And when any one considers with what eagerness men engage in privateering, as soon as they receive permission to plunder the merchants of a neighbouring country with impunity; and how small account they make of the blood shed on either side, in attempting to seize the property of those with whom they have no personal quarrel; he will readily perceive how little most men are governed by principles of equity and humanity, when motives of interest urge them on, and they may gratify their avarice without losing their reputation, or exposing themselves to the lash of the law. For in the court of conscience, of reason, and of Scripture, this common practice is not much more justifiable than that of these ancient associated freebooters: except a man can say, as in the presence of God, 'I do not seek private emolument, but the public good; and to weaken an unjust and unreasonable enemy, that an equitable and durable peace may be re-established.'

V. 17-19. The snare of Satan, in exciting men to rapine and bloodshed, is as manifest as the net spread in the sight of the bird, who will in that case fly away. He aims to allure those that are greedy of gain, by the prospect of plunder and impunity, to shed the blood of their unoffending neighbours; and by this bait he intends to take their souls in his net. Such depredators commonly come to an untimely end, either by the sword of justice, or by that of war, or of private revenge; and they are all the while treasuring up wrath against the day of wrath and vengeance. For however human laws are framed and executed, and however they may be eluded or out-braved, yet the vengeance of God pursues every murderer to death and perdition, except deep repentance intervene. They therefore are as foolish, as if they lay in wait for their own lives and souls.—The last clause may be rendered, "which taketh away the lives of those, who are under the power of it." Gain, when greedily sought and by unjust means, proves the destruction of those who are thus led captive by the love of it.

V. 20. The word translated wisdom is plural, as well as feminine; and is generally understood to mean the highest and most eminent wisdom, and may either denote the instruction of God's word, personified, as wisdom speaking to mankind, or Jesus Christ, as the word and wisdom of God, and the great prophet of the church, and light of the world. Whether the sacred writer intended expressly to prophesy of the Messiah; or whether the Israelites would generally consider Him as the speaker in these addresses, needs not to be determined. To us, who have the New Testament for our guide, this latter is by far the most simple manner of considering the subject, and it gives the exhortations of Wisdom a peculiar majesty and emphasis; nor can any material objection be made to it; unless men would substitute carnal wisdom, in the stead of that wisdom which is from above. And the coincidence of the words of Wisdom with the doctrine of Christ renders it obvious to adopt this mode of exposition. 'He that is the eternal and uncreated wisdom of the Father, uses all means to draw men unto God: both by his works, and by his word, he inviteth all men to the knowledge and love of the truth.' (Bp. Hall.) 'This wisdom is the eternal word of God.' (Marg. Ref.) It is remarkable that the original is future, "Wisdom shall cry without," &c.

V. 21-23. Christ, by his own personal ministry, and by that of his apostles and evangelists, and ever since by his faithful and zealous ministers, hath addressed himself to sinners, in the most earnest and public manner, and in every place where they are to be met with: of this he gave the example, by preaching in houses and synagogues, the courts of the temple, the streets, fields, mountains, and plains, as occasion required.—By "the simple ones, who love simplicity," are meant the ignorant, unwary, and careless, who love to continue thoughtless and dissipated; having no desire to trouble their minds about any thing which interferes with their present pursuits of pleasure or worldly advantage. "The scornors who delight in their scorning," are they who deride and revile the truths and precepts of the gospel, and glory in their impiety, infidelity, and blasphemy, and in making proselytes to their principles. And "the fools, who hate knowledge," may mean such persons, as have had some acquaintance with religion, and whose consciences have been distressed by it; but determining to gratify their lusts, they hold the truth in unrighteousness, sin in defiance of their convictions, and hate that knowledge which makes them dread the most fatal effects of their daring wickedness: (John iii. 19-21.) Persons, however, of all these characters are here expostulated with upon the madness of continuing longer in wickedness; they are commanded to repent, and turn to Christ, at his reproof; nay, the gift of the Holy Spirit, to be their teacher and sanctifier, is promised to such as attend to the gracious proposal.—"I offer unto you, both my word outwardly to your ears, and a plentiful measure of my Spirit inwardly to your hearts, to make that word effectual to you." (Bp. Hall.)

V. 24-31. The nature and consequences of rejecting the invitations of heavenly wisdom, are here most affectingly displayed, and in terms entirely coincident with many passages in the New Testament. (Marg. Ref.) The gracious Saviour invites, exhorts, and warns; but sinners refuse to hearken: he stretches out his hands, to afford them help, or to confer blessings upon them, or as earnestly beseeching them to accept of his salvation; but they pay no regard to him: he gives them the best of counsel, mingled with salutary reproof; but they despise his counsel, and reject his reproof with scorn, preferring the flattering advice of Satan and his instruments; for indeed they "hate knowledge, and will not choose the fear of the Lord." But, in the event they will certainly be overtaken with dreadful calamities and terrors, desolating them of every hope and comfort; with destruction bearing them away, like an impetuous whirlwind, whilst distress and anguish seize upon them. Then, indeed, they would fain be rescued from hell by the arm of the despised Saviour, and will hastily call to him to help them; but, as they before scorned him and his reproof, so will he then neglect and disdain their cries, terrors, and distress; and thus "they will eat of the fruit of their own ways, and be filled for ever with their own devices."—The change of persons, from a direct address to the despisers themselves, to such as are supposed to witness the awful scene, is peculiarly impressive. Let all, who have not been given up to judicial obduracy, hear and take warning: "let all notice the equity of this most severe infliction of vengeance on obstinate enemies and despisers."

V. 32, 33. The sinner's "turning away" from the instructions of Christ, is the immediate cause of his destruction, and a most dreadful species of self-murder; while the prosperity, or rather the ease, or carnal security, in which such hardened sinners live, ripens them apace for destruction.—("Ease," that is, the prosperity and sensuality, in which they delight.) Whereas, the holy confidence and hope in God, grounded on his word, of those who hearken to the voice of wisdom, and are preserved from the fear of evil, even in the greatest extremities, is a contrast to that sensual and careless security in prosperous circumstances, which is turned into terror and despair, in the season of danger and alarm.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1-19. If God impart wisdom and entrust authority to the same person, a vast advantage is afforded him for the extensive communication of good instructions. But the inspiration of the Holy Spirit gives an authority to the Scriptures, far beyond what they could derive from the honourable descent, the dignity, wealth, wisdom, or renown of those employed in committing them to writing.—It is the design of every part of revelation, to "cause us to know wisdom and instruction; to perceive the words of understanding," and to receive lessons of heavenly discretion; that we may pursue the noblest ends by the most effectual means, and may learn to walk with God, and among men, "in justice, judgment, and equity." These divine instructions suffice to render the unlearned, and those of slender abilities, discerning and sagacious, and able to detect and elude the most crafty designs of wicked men, and of the devil; nay, even to cure the rashness of inexperienced youth, and to render them prudent and discreet. And as Solomon, or he who inspired Solomon, proposed such benefit to us by this book, we should enter upon the reading of it with fervent prayer to the fountain and giver of wisdom, to enable us to profit by it. Indeed, a teachable disposition, arising from a due valuation of heavenly knowledge, united with a consciousness of our own ignorance and fallibility, form a proper test and standard of our own progress in wisdom. The wise man will always be a learner: he will therefore hear and add to this treasure from every maxim, in proportion as he attains to the true interpretation of it, and discovers the meaning of those words of the wise, that to the careless, superficial, and conceited appear dark sayings. All who are taught of God, agree that true knowledge and wisdom are practical; and begin with, and principally consist in, the fear of God, and a due regard to his authority. The most sagacious in worldly things, and the most learned in all human sciences, are miserably infatuated, if they despise this wisdom and instruction; and do not make it their grand concern to do the will of God, and seek his favour; yet, alas, how is the earth filled, and its eminent places occupied, by such profane and foolish despisers!—Whilst young persons are exhorted and "charged to hear the instruction of their fathers, and at no time to forsake the law of their mothers;" how forcibly are parents called upon to give them such instructions, to set them such good examples, and so to exercise their authority, as may indeed conduce to their children's best advantage; and to what a wretched dilemma do many parents reduce their offspring, who must either renounce their instructions and injunctions, or disobey God, and ruin their own souls! In this case, indeed, the matter is decided, and they must obey God rather than men. But, alas! children are commonly least disposed to be duly observant of wise and pious parents, who would direct them in the way to durable honour and felicity. When youthful inexperience unites with self-sufficiency and impatience of control, they form a proper prey for the artful and profligate. With flattering caresses, and encomiums, and large promises of pleasure, advantage, and impunity, they entice them to join their cabals and imitate their crimes; and when once they have consented, they are caught in a net whence few ever escape. Would young persons shun temporal or eternal ruin, let them turn a deaf ear to all such syren songs, and refuse to take one step in these destructive paths; for, whilst they haste to obtain money to defray the expenses of their licentiousness, "their feet run to evil, and they make haste to shed blood;" thus they are caught in Satan's net, which is spread before their eyes; they are forming a conspiracy against their own lives, and employing their ingenuity and activity in rendering themselves execrable and miserable, in bringing themselves to an untimely end, and in ripening apace for eternal destruction. So are the ways of all, in every rank of society, who, being greedy of gain, seize upon it, by oppressing or taking away the lives of their fellow-creatures.

V. 20-33. Would men keep at a distance from the destructive temptations of Satan and his servants, they should hearken to the voice of wisdom; they should attend to the gospel, and the sacred word by which the Saviour addresses them with inconceivable affection and earnestness. After his example, and in the same fervent and sympathizing tenderness, his ministers should "preach the word, instant in season, and out of season," whenever or wherever they can get men to attend. And surely none should censure their brethren, who cry without in the streets, in the chief places of concourse, and in the opening of the gates, being greatly in earnest to snatch sinners as brands from the burning; when the wisdom of God hath given them the example. Nay, if the same divine Saviour exhorts, warns, and invites even scorners and fools that hate knowledge, and simple ones who love simplicity; they certainly come the nearest to wisdom, who call upon sinners of every description to repent and believe, and be saved.—The love and condescension of Christ, and the gracious promises that he mingles with his reproofs, whilst he declares his readiness to pour out his Spirit, and make known his words to those who turn to him, should surely attract the attention of the most careless and ungodly; and it may well be enquired of them, how long they mean to proceed in such a perilous path, when the uncertainty of life, and the tremendous consequences of dying without Christ, are considered? But if sinners, bent upon the indulgence of their lusts, now refuse, disregard, despise, revile, and hate the counsels and proposals of the Son of God; they will hereafter curse their own madness and folly. Some few on earth anticipate their own doom, and are left to desperation for a warning to others; and many cry out in terror of conscience for deliverance from torment, without any desire after redemption from iniquity; and therefore they cry in vain; though none can at any period of life heartily pray for the whole salvation of the gospel, and be rejected. But no words can express the horror, distress, and anguish of the wicked, when standing before the tribunal of their angry Judge: when all their pleas, and extorted cries for mercy, shall be disregarded and despised. "Then will he laugh at their calamity, and mock when their fear cometh;" turning to others, he will shew the reasons of his severity, without vouching them a word or a look; and even the rocks and the mountains will refuse to hide them from his wrath. Then will they receive the due reward of their crimes, and especially of their contempt of Christ and his salvation. "Knowing therefore the terror of the Lord, we would persuade" sinners to repent, and not turn away from the Saviour to their own destruction. And surely we should not fear the cross of his people, nor envy the prosperity of fools which destroys them! But we should hearken diligently and obediently to the Lord Jesus, that we may dwell safely under his protection, and enjoy peace of conscience and confidence in God, and be free from fear of evil, in life, in death, in judgment, and for ever.

NOTES.

CHAP. II. V. 1. Wisdom having finally warned the careless and unteachable, who despised her instructions, and denounced their doom, here proceeds to teach and exhort her children, (Matt. xi. 19. Luke vii. 35.) for this seems to be the sacred writer's intention, which he pursues in most parts of these introductory chapters, under the figure of a father instructing his son: though it is the general opinion of commentators, that he had the best interests of his son Rehoboam peculiarly in view, while he was employed on these important subjects.

V. 2. "If thou give thyself to the true knowledge of God without hypocrisy."

V. 3, 4. "If thou express such a desire of it, as men do of what they most need, and without which they are in danger to perish; praying those that are able to inform them; and beseeching God likewise, with ardent devotion, that he would bring thee acquainted with it." "If thou dost value this wisdom above the greatest treasures, and shew thy esteem of it by studious seeking of it, as covetous men do for money; not giving over thy labour presently, if thou findest not what thou desirest, but enquiring still; and sparing no pains to know what the will of the Lord is." (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 5. "The fear of the Lord," and "the knowledge of God," are concise scriptural terms for the whole of that religion, by which sinful men come to God, walk with him, enjoy his favour, and inherit eternal life. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 6. "The Lord will give wisdom," (the literal rendering;) that is, to those who thus seek and pray for it: and he will do this, by means of the words which he hath spoken by his holy prophets. The wisdom, which he gives by his Spirit in answer to prayer, to those who diligently seek it, accords to the written word, and must be tried by it.

V. 7. He, &c. Some versions render this, "He preserveth the state," &c. or "He hideth the salvation of the righteous," &c. "Our life is hid with Christ in God." But the literal meaning seems to be, "He reserveth essential good for the righteous:" all things pertaining, to life and godliness; "that which exists independently of this changing world, and shall exist for ever." (Marg. Ref.)

V. 9. Some versions include the passage from the beginning of the third verse, in a parenthesis. "If thou apply thine heart to understanding,—then shalt thou understand," &c: the intermediate verses being an explanation of the words "apply thy heart," &c; and the grounds of the assurance assurance.

V. 10, 11. The first steps towards heavenly wisdom may be attended with difficulty, and seem unpleasant: but, it is here intimated, that when wisdom hath entered into the heart, it will become pleasant to the soul: and by its pleasantness, as well as its instructions, preserve the possessor from the destructive allurements of sin.—"The word of God shall teach thee, and counsel thee how to govern thyself."

V. 12. (Note, i. 10.—14.) One ruinous effect of bad company was shewn in the preceding chapter; but another, not less fatal, is pointed out in this: for the company of ungodly and profligate men is the common introduction of young persons into the society of abandoned women.

V. 13, 14. They leave "the word of God, which is the only light, to follow their own fancies which are darkness." Infidelity and impiety prepare the mind for debauchery, and prevent the disturbance of conscience, which would otherwise interrupt the quiet of those who rejoice in doing evil.

V. 15. Crooked, &c. (Note, Psalm cxv. 5.)

V. 16. Strange woman, &c. That is, the harlot or prostitute. These were either heathen women, who subsisted by prostitution in the land of Israel; or such Israelitish women, as were worthy to be treated as strangers, or Gentiles. Some indeed think, that the fascinations of idolatry, or false religion and of worldly pleasures, are meant in these warnings, as well as the crimes immediately specified: but the literal meaning is of vast importance; and observation on the ways of men will convince a serious enquirer, that the strong expressions used by Solomon, concerning the fatal consequences of these vices, have a peculiar propriety.

V. 17. "That is, her husband, which is her head and guide to govern her; from whom she ought not to depart, but remain in his subjection."—"The covenant of her God," "is the promise made in marriage."

V. 18. The dead. The word is the same, that is used for the giants who were destroyed by the deluge; and the state of future punishment seems to be intended.—"By what name—was this place of the damned expressed, before the word Gehenna or Gehinnom came to be used?—It seems to have been called the house of the giants. (xxi. 16.)—They shall go and keep them company," (namely, the giants, whose wickedness provoked God to drown the world;) "that is, go to the accursed place and condition which they are in." (Mede.)

V. 19. "It is rarely seen, that any body, who is drawn into her embraces, ever gets out again; she holds them so fast by her enchantments, and they are so blinded and bewildered by her arts." (Bp. Patrick.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1-9 They, who earnestly seek heavenly wisdom will never have cause to complain that they have lost their labour: and the freeness of the gift doth not supersede the necessity of our diligence. (John, vi. 27.) God alone bestows this blessing: he hath given his Son to be "made wisdom unto us," and in him are laid up all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge for our use. These he communicates through his holy word: and it especially teaches us to fear God, and so to know him, as to trust in his mercy, and delight greatly in his commandments. This sound wisdom and substantial good is reserved for the righteous, and for them exclusively, that they may pass safely through this perilous world to heaven: "for the Lord is a buckler to them that walk uprightly."—Would we obtain this inestimable treasure, we must receive the words of Christ, and, by daily study and meditation, hide his commandments in our hearts: we must habitually have our ear open to instruction, and our minds applied to understanding. Above all, we must with earnestness "cry after knowledge, and lift up our voice" in prayer for understanding. (Jam. i. 5.) For in no other way can "we understand the fear of the Lord, and find the knowledge of God." Those persons, therefore, whose religious knowledge has been obtained without this application of mind and fervency of prayer, have an internal demonstration that it is not of the right sort: if it hath cost them only a little of this labour, it must at best be very scanty and superficial: and they, who are more eager to grow rich or great; or more intent about their pleasures, or the curiosities of science, than about this divine wisdom; may be sure that as yet they know nothing as they ought to know; nor will they ever, unless they value the prize at another rate, and pursue it in another manner. But they value wisdom above rubies; and seek for it with that unwearied diligence and perseverance, with which the miner delves in the earth for the silver ore, or the miser scrapes together his heap of money, "shall understand righteousness, judgment, and equity, yea, every good path." (1 Cor. ii. 13-15. Col. i. 9, 10.) For when divine truth thus gains admission into the heart, and the soul is taught to relish and delight in it, discretion shall preserve and understanding shall keep men from the dangers to which others are exposed: for it is in this manner that "the Lord keepeth and guardeth the paths of judgment, and preserveth the way of his saints."

NOTES.

CHAP. III. V. 2. Temperance, chastity, honesty, and industry, which are inseparable from a life of true piety, do in the ordinary course of things conduce to health, safety, and long life: and this is sufficient to warrant these general maxims of wisdom, without supposing them to be direct promises, which are invariably fulfilled.—"Long life is the blessing of God, which he giveth to his, so far forth as it is expedient to them."

V. 3, 4. "The mercy and faithfulness which we ought to use towards our neighbour," after the example of the Lord's mercy and truth to us. "Count these thy ornament and thy treasure: then shalt thou be so favoured and directed by the Lord, that thy affairs, being managed discreetly, shall generally be crowned with good success." (Marg. Ref.)

V. 5, 6. Entire dependence on the providence and promises of God, in every undertaking, is here contrasted with a man's "leaning to his own understanding." He who "trusts in the Lord with all his heart," is doubtless a true believer; and he expects the blessing from God, on his lawful undertakings in the use of allowable means, and these alone: but he who "leans to his own understanding," engages in such pursuits as are agreeable to his own inclinations, and relies on his own capacity, policy, or management, for success; and consequently he is under continual temptations to deviate from the path of duty, both as to the end proposed, and the means of accomplishing it. This is therefore the result of pride, unbelief, ungodliness, and a worldly heart; and leads to further transgressions; the other is the way of humility, faith, piety, peace, and safety. This is further recommended by the exhortations to know, and "acknowledge God in all our ways."—When a man undertakes nothing without consulting the word of God as to its lawfulness, and seeking his direction in prayer as to its expediency; when he seeks counsel, assistance, and a blessing from God in all his concerns; when he acknowledges his authority and providence, aiming to do his will and glorify his name; when he makes the Lord his friend and counsellor in every thing, neglecting no proper means for discovering his will and ensuring his blessing: then he "acknowledges him in all his ways," and may confidently expect "that he will direct his paths." And they who do this constantly, seldom fall into prejudicial mistakes which almost universally arise from neglect of these rules, from men's fondness for their own schemes, and partiality towards such measures as seem to promise external advantages, or accession to their reputation or enjoyment.

V. 7, 8. "Never be guilty of such folly as to conceit thine own wit to be so great, that thou canst manage affairs thereby in thine own way, (neglecting the rules that God hath prescribed thee), to thy satisfaction:—(Marg. Ref.) but have a religious regard to him, who can either disappoint or prosper thee as he pleases; and, avoid most cautiously those practices which he hath forbidden. This is the way to preserve a good habit both of body and soul." (Bp. Patrick.) —Navel. Some suppose that this clause alludes to a custom of applying medicinal preparations to the navels of children, for the prevention of diseases; and that it was a proverbial expression, denoting health and cheerfulness.

V. 9, 10. Several laws were given concerning the first-fruits of different kinds; most of which were offered at the sanctuary or given to the priests: but some were appointed to be spent in feasting before the Lord, with the Levite, the stranger, the widow, and the fatherless. (Notes, &c. Deut. xii. xxvi.) But the spirit of these laws is here inculcated, by a general exhortation to "honour the Lord with their substance," &c.: by employing his bounty in works of piety and charity, as circumstances required; which instead of impoverishing, would secure the blessing of God on their fields and vineyards, and every work of their hands. "For to the faithful distributor, God giveth in greater abundance."

V. 11, 12. (Notes, Job v. 17, Heb. xii. 5-11.) The apostle expressly quotes this passage, with a special reference to the address, "My son;" and in a manner which decisively proves, that he considered it as the exhortation of our heavenly Father to his afflicted children: now, this method of quoting it, both shews that the apostle considered the book as divinely inspired, and also who it is that speaks in the instructions given by Wisdom to her children. The conclusion, indeed, of the quotation, comes nearer to the Septuagint than to the original, but the former part entirely accords with the passage before us.—"Suppose it be his pleasure that any affliction should befall thee, my son, let not that dissatisfy thee, nor make thee either doubt of his gracious providence numerous bad examples and crafty seducers of both sexes, exceedingly endanger men's souls, especially in the giddy season of youth. But they, who ask wisdom from God, and delight in his word, will shun those scenes and companies, where these dangers most abound, and will avoid the company of the evil man. For such as "leave the paths of uprightness, to walk in the ways of darkness, whose delight is in doing evil, and in the frowardness of the wicked," are very zealous to corrupt the principles and morals of those who are apparently well-disposed; that they may strengthen their party, and keep themselves in countenance: nay, being instigated by Satan, and as it were inspired as his prophets, their mouths utter perverse things; and they are continually disseminating infidelity, impiety, and licentiousness among the rising generation. Thus thousands of simple ones are trained up in the school, and qualified to assume the chair, of the scorner; and the academies for teaching these sciences are not likely to want experienced and laborious preceptors. Indeed the minds of our youth, before they arrive at manhood, are too generally prepared for scenes of debauchery, in concert with profaneness, and they fall an easy prey to those wicked women, who are too numerous to be thought strangers in our streets. These are perhaps the victims of seduction by more hardened profligates: or a loose education, and early habits of sloth and extravagance, lead them into such infamous courses; or they adulterously have broken the marriage-covenant, solemnly engaged to in the presence of God, and been unfaithful to them who ought to have been the guides of their youth. But (however themselves initiated in the ways of vice) they assault the young and inexperienced with their flatteries and insinuating blandishments; and aid them in getting over the remaining scruples of conscience, and the restraints of fear and shame; and so qualify them to go forth to seduce the daughters, and debauch the wives, of their friends and neighbours. These are prevailing evils, which excite the sorrow of every serious and pious mind; and must cause the reflecting parent to look upon his children with tears, lest they should be caught in the fatal snare. For, however light the inconsiderate make of these things, it is plain in fact, that "the house of the harlot inclineth to death, and her paths to the dead;" numbers are thus first led to venture into those violent or fraudulent practices, (in order to gratify the exorbitant demands of an extravagant prostitute, or to support the expenses of their lusts,) which terminate in an ignominious execution, or in banishment from civilized society, to some remote and desolate region, where there are scarcely any to plunder. Thousands prematurely perish by loathsome diseases, perhaps more desolating in these later ages than the sword of war: others, unreformed, are united with virtuous women, to whom they cause inexpressible misery, and train up children by their example and discourse, to live, like them, the nuisances of society. And the corrupt language of those few of them who live to old age, too plainly shews, that with worn-out bodies they possess hearts as debauched as in the vigour of youth.—The abounding grace of God indeed snatches a very few as brands out of the burning; and perhaps sometimes an individual may be otherwise reformed: but these rare exceptions consist very well with its being a general rule, that none, who form connections and habits of this kind, "return again, to take hold of the paths of life." How carefully then should parents watch over their children, to keep them at a distance from the fatal precipice! and they should never mention such subjects, as too many do, as the foibles or slips of youth; but with horror, as the most tremendous of all vicious habits. How carefully should every young man keep at a distance from the entrance upon this perilous way! shunning such seducers more than a person infected with the plague. How should they store their minds with heavenly wisdom, and learn to relish purer pleasures, and pray to be kept by the grace of God from the dangerous snare, "that they may walk in the way of good men, and keep the paths of the righteous!" For the upright believer shall not only inherit heaven, but have the best portion on earth: living in the Lord's land, and enjoying peace and comfort, "when the wicked shall be cut off from the earth, and transgressors rooted out of it." Finally, let us not, in general, it is expedient for young persons to enter into the married state, before they have contracted bad habits, in order to prevent these fatal consequences: and, having made a prudent and pious choice, to be faithful to the covenant of God, and an affectionate guide of the youth, to one who is suited for a helper in the way to heaven. "For marriage is honourable in all, and the bed undefiled; but whoremongers and adulterers God will judge."

towards thee, or out of impatience take any unlawful course to remove it.' (Bp. Patrick.)—The extremes of insensibility and of despondency seem especially intended; and a proper submission and improvement of the paternal discipline are inculcated.

V. 16, 17. 'He that seeketh wisdom, that is, suffereth himself to be governed by the word of God, shall have all prosperity'—(Note 2.) That length of days which wisdom holds in her right hand, and offers to her votaries, as her chief good, no doubt includes the gift of God, which is eternal life, through Jesus Christ; whilst the riches and honour in her left, comprise all desirable prosperity and comfort in this world. The ways also, in which she requires her children to walk, "are pleasantness and peace."—Christ's "yoke is easy, and his burden light." "The kingdom of God is righteousness, peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost:" and all the unpleasantness connected with true religion, arises from the opposition of depraved nature and bad habits, with this evil world and Satan, while men are striving to enter her paths; and the devious steps which even Wisdom's children make, to their grief and wounding.

V. 18. 'Tree of life,' which bringeth forth such fruit, that they that eat thereof have life; and he alludeth to the tree of life in paradise.' (Marg. Ref.)

V. 19, 20. The wisdom which God giveth to his people, is an emanation from his own infinite wisdom, by which he formed the plan of the whole creation, and of its several parts; and must on that account be unspeakably valuable. The whole, however, may be applied to Jesus Christ, the Wisdom of God, "by whom also he made the worlds." (Note, viii. 22-32.) 'Whereby he sheweth, that this wisdom, whereof he speaketh, is everlasting, because it was before all creatures, and that all things, even the whole world, were made by it.' (Marg. Ref.)

V. 23-25. The composure and serenity arising from faith in the promises and providence of God, and the testimony of a good conscience, are here described as the effects of hearkening to wisdom, in language which agrees with the general scope of the holy Scriptures in this respect. The twenty-fifth verse, like the others, is future; and the old translation is more literal: "Thou shalt not fear for any sudden fear; neither for the destruction of the wicked when it cometh."—'When the Lord destroyeth the wicked, he will save his, as he did Lot in Sodom.'

V. 26. 'For JEHOVAH shall be present according to thy confidence,' &c.

V. 27, 28. This exhortation exposes the avaricious backwardness of numbers to discharge their debts, taxes, and dues, even when able, and their unwillingness to pay their labourers and servants; and especially their reluctance to part with their money in acts of piety and charity. When they know not on what pretence to refuse, they procrastinate; being fondly tenacious of their golden idol; and hoping that they shall be forgotten, that the design will be dropped, or that somebody else will bear the expense.—The Septuagint makes many interpolations in this book, and here adds, 'for thou knowest not what the following day shall bring forth.'

V. 29. Seeing. "And he dwelleth in confidence with thee,"—"That is, he putteth his trust in thee." The baseness of those who take occasion from the confidence placed in them, to defraud and injure them, is most emphatically exposed.

V. 32. Secret. 'That is, his covenant and fatherly affection, which is hid and secret from the world.'

V. 34. The apostles, James and Peter, have quoted the Septuagint translation of these words, with no other alteration than that of God for Lord. "God resisteth the proud; but giveth his grace unto the humble." (Marg. Ref.)

CHAP. IV.

Solomon shews what good instruction he had received from his parents, concerning the advantages of wisdom, in order to induce obedience, 1—13. He dissuades from the path of the wicked, and contrasts it with that of the righteous, 14—19. Further admonitions and counsels of Wisdom, 20—27.

HEAR, ye children, the instruction of a father, and attend to know understanding.

2 For I give you good doctrine forsake ye not my law.

3 For I was my father's son, tender and only beloved in the sight of my mother.

4 He taught me also and said unto me, Let thine heart retain my words: keep my commandments, and live.

5 Get wisdom, get understanding: forget it not; neither decline from the words of my mouth.

6 Forsake her not, and she shall preserve thee: love her, and she shall keep thee.

7 Wisdom is the principal thing; therefore get wisdom; and with all thy getting get understanding.

8 Exalt her, and she shall promote thee: she shall bring thee to honour, when thou dost embrace her.

9 She shall give to thine head an ornament of grace: a crown of glory shall she deliver to thee.

10 Hear, O my son, and receive my sayings; and the years of thy life shall be many.

11 I have taught thee in the way of wisdom; I have led thee in right paths.

12 When thou goest, thy steps shall not be straitened; and when thou runnest, thou shalt not stumble.

13 Take fast hold of instruction: let her not go: keep her; for she is thy life.

14 Enter not into the path of the wicked, and go not in the way of evil men.

15 Avoid it, pass not by it, turn from it, and pass away.

16 For they sleep not, except they have done mischief; and their sleep is taken away, unless they cause some to fall.

17 For they eat the bread of wickedness, and drink the wine of violence.

18 But the path of the just is as the shining light, that shineth more and more unto the perfect day.

19 The way of the wicked is as darkness: they know not at what they stumble.

20 My son, attend to my words; incline thine ear unto my sayings.

21 Let them not depart from thine eyes; keep them in the midst of thine heart.

22 Hearken to the voice of wisdom, and thou shalt not be ashamed: for she shall bring thee to honour, when thou dost embrace her.

23 For she shall give to thine head an ornament of grace: a crown of glory shall she deliver to thee.

24 Hearken to the voice of wisdom, and thou shalt not be ashamed: for she shall bring thee to honour, when thou dost embrace her.

25 For she shall give to thine head an ornament of grace: a crown of glory shall she deliver to thee.

26 Hearken to the voice of wisdom, and thou shalt not be ashamed: for she shall bring thee to honour, when thou dost embrace her.

27 For she shall give to thine head an ornament of grace: a crown of glory shall she deliver to thee.

28 Hearken to the voice of wisdom, and thou shalt not be ashamed: for she shall bring thee to honour, when thou dost embrace her.

29 For she shall give to thine head an ornament of grace: a crown of glory shall she deliver to thee.

30 Hearken to the voice of wisdom, and thou shalt not be ashamed: for she shall bring thee to honour, when thou dost embrace her.

31 For she shall give to thine head an ornament of grace: a crown of glory shall she deliver to thee.

lasting contempt shall be their final promotion: whilst his favour shall be shewn, and his grace communicated, to the humble believer, who alone is truly wise, and who shall at length inherit everlasting glory.

NOTES.

CHAP. IV. V. 1. 'The dulness, sluggishness, and forgetfulness of mankind, in their principal concerns, are so notorious, that we need not wonder that the wise man repeats the same things....All his pains, he knew would be lost without serious consideration of what he had said: and the very first step to wisdom is to have a mind to be wise....Listen then all ye that are desirous to learn, to the instructions, which out of a paternal affection I bring from God unto you.' (Bp. Patrick.)—'He speaks this in the character of a preacher—which is as a father to his people.—Solomon had one son and two daughters, of whom we read; and perhaps he meant to address himself to them: but the holy Spirit directed him to such instructions, as would be generally useful; and doubtless many thousands have derived more benefit from them than his own son did.

V. 3. Solomon was beloved by the Lord, and appointed to the kingdom; no doubt he was also regarded by his father with peculiar affection, and probably received a more careful education than David's other sons had done, to which the misconduct of Amnon, Absalom, and Adonijah might conduce. Bathsheba had more children by David; but Solomon, being (as Isaac) a child of promise, was peculiarly dear to her likewise. (Note, 1 Chr. iii. 1—9.)

V. 4. 'To make his exhortations more acceptable, he acquaints the reader, with the lessons which his own father and mother were wont to give him; and the great benefit he had received by them.'—This shews, 'the care that parents ought to take, to instruct their children diligently; and the greater they are (suppose princes) the more accurate their education ought to be, as Solomon's was.' (Bp. Patrick.)—From this verse to the end of the thirteenth, may be considered as David's exhortation to Solomon. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 7. 'He sheweth, that we must first begin at God's word, if so be we will that other things should prosper with us; contrary to the judgment of the world, which make it their last study, or care not for it at all.'

V. 11. 'Solomon declareth what care his father had to bring him up in the true fear of God; for this was David's protestation.' (Notes, iii.)

V. 13. 'Take such fast hold of it, as never, for want of care and pains, to let it slip out of thy mind; keep it as a most precious treasure, for all thy happiness depends on it.' (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 14, 15. Solomon, or rather heavenly wisdom by him, seems here to resume the discourse by most earnestly dissuading from every degree of intimacy with wicked men, and from whatever might prove a temptation to it.

V. 16, 17. To do evil is more natural to the wicked, 'than to sleep, eat, or drink.'—Having formed their iniquitous plans, they are restless till they have accomplished them: they spend those hours in perpetrating crimes, which others give to repose: and they make their violence and deceit bear the expenses of their voluptuousness.

V. 18, 19. The Septuagint version, of the first of these verses, is very expressive. 'The ways of the righteous shine like the light: they go on and shine, until the day be perfected.'—The path of the just, or righteous, is that way in which a believer walks, from the time when he begins to seek the Lord, to the close of his days. A glimmering of knowledge at first pervades the darkness of his mind, as to spiritual things, and some feeble desires after God and holiness arise in his heart; Thus the day dawns: but frequently these feeble beginnings cannot be distinguished from many specious appearances

24 <sup>n</sup>Put away from thee <sup>a</sup>a froward mouth, and perverse lips put far from thee.

which afterwards vanish: when, however, they arise from divine life communicated to the soul, the glimmering light will increase. Advancing knowledge gradually dispels ignorance and error; peace and comfort are obtained, and established on a firm base; and holy affections and dispositions ripen into fruits and habits. Thus this light shines progressively, not wasting as that of a taper, or declining as that of the setting sun; but increasing as that of the morning, until perfected in the knowledge, holiness, and felicity of heaven. This light comes from Christ at the first, and is augmented, and will be perfected with the knowledge of him: and the way, in which he directs the soul, and on which it shines continually, is that of humble faith and obedient love. But the way of the wicked, though they amuse themselves with following many glimmering meteors, is as thick darkness, a compound of ignorance, error, sin, and misery, which continually increases, until at length it terminates in "the blackness of darkness for ever;" into which they stumble unawares, and they know not how.

V. 21. 'Read them over and over again, and keep them perpetually in mind.' (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 22. 'Under health of body all other blessings promised in the law are contained.'

V. 23. As the heart in the body seems the centre and fountain of life, because the blood thence circulates into every part, conveying with it health or disease: so are the affections to a man's whole conduct. If the heart, in this sense, be purified by faith and grace, and be properly kept, the tenor of the thoughts, words, and actions will be pure, for they flow from it: if it be the residence of pride, impiety, unbelief, avarice, malice, or lust, the whole conduct will be tainted with these vices: if they find admission, or prevail for a season, they will proportionably infect the tempers, conduct, and discourse. Therefore this citadel should above all things be garrisoned that it may not be seized, this spring should be watched, that it may not be poisoned; for as the heart is, so will the life be; if not openly, yet in the sight of God, before whom thoughts, desires, and dispositions decide a man's character. 'For as the heart is either pure or corrupt, so is the whole course of a man's life.'

V. 24, 25. Next to the heart, the tongue, that unruly member, must be bridled, and kept most diligently: and a strong guard must be placed upon the eyes, which are the avenues to the heart; that they may be employed in looking well to the path of duty, and not in gazing at such objects as excite evil desires in thee.

V. 26. The apostle nearly quotes the Septuagint translation of the first clause of this verse; "And make straight paths to our feet." (Heb. xii. 13.) The marginal reading of the latter clause seems preferable.—'By a proper regard to the path of thy feet, all thy ways shall be ordered aright.'

V. 27. 'Do not suffer thyself to be drawn aside, either to superstition on the one hand, or to contempt and neglect of religion on the other: let neither love of friends or hatred of enemies; neither hope of pleasure or gain, nor fear of pain and damage; neither prosperous nor cross events; ever move thee to turn into either extreme from the rule of virtue.' (Bp. Patrick.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—13. Good instructions, given with paternal authority and affection, have a peculiar claim to the obedient attention of young persons; and will be thus received by every one who applies his mind to the practical knowledge of divine truth: so that they who refuse such instructions and injunctions will be left without excuse. How aggravated then is the guilt of those who reject the doctrine and forsake the law of the God of heaven, whilst he condescends to speak to them with the tender compassion of a father!—We ought to show our love to our children, by instructing them diligently in true wisdom: and that preference which is shewn to such as are most teachable, is no sinful partiality. A special honour is in Scripture given to the pious education of children, as the means by which the Lord giveth wisdom and grace; and men should require their parents for this unspeaking obligation, by handing down their instructions, in their name and with respect to their memories, to their children also; for their intention was, that their remote posterity should thus derive the advantage. (Ps. lxxviii. 3—7.)—Pious men, in every age of the world, and of every rank in society, agree, that true wisdom consists in obedience, and is inseparably connected with happiness: and the well-beloved Son of the Father says to us, "Let thy heart retain my words, keep my commandments and live;" (Marg. Ref.) He is the wisdom of God: an interest in his salvation we should get, whatever we go without or lose for his sake; his words we should remember, and not decline from them, whatever we forget or omit. This "wisdom is the principal thing," the "pearl of great price," the sinner's "one thing needful;" and if we sell all to purchase it, forsake all to secure it, count all

Exhortations to study wisdom, 1, 2. The seductions of harlots, and the complicated mischiefs of their society, 3—14. A figurative commendation of marriage, and of affection to a man's wife and children, 15—19. A further dissuasive from whoredom; urging the Lord's continual presence, and the miserable end of wicked men, 20—22.

MY son, <sup>a</sup>attend unto my wisdom, and <sup>b</sup>bow thine ear to my understanding:

2 That thou mayest regard discretion, and <sup>c</sup>that thy lips may keep knowledge.

3 For <sup>d</sup>the lips of a strange woman drop as an honeycomb, and her <sup>e</sup>mouth is <sup>f</sup>smoother than oil:

4 But <sup>g</sup>her end is bitter as wormwood, <sup>h</sup>sharp as a two-edged sword.

but loss for the excellency of it, and lay down our lives in adhering to it, our gain will be sure and infinite. For whilst we love and honour the Redeemer, he will preserve us from every danger, keep our souls unto eternal life, give us that honour that cometh from God, adorn us with the ornament and beauties of holiness, and deliver to us "a crown of glory, that fadeth not away." But how poor, and contemptible, and wretched will they be, who, with all their getting of wealth, of learning, of reputation, of preferment, or dominion, die without getting understanding, "without Christ, without hope, and without God!" Let us then receive the sayings of Him who "hath the words of eternal life," and we shall daily perceive, and experience, that "He hath taught us in the way of wisdom, and led us in right paths." Thus shall we avoid the intricacies and perplexities, in which crafty men are entangled; our path will be plain before us, and we shall proceed with alacrity, confidence, and safety; not straitened in our steps, nor stumbling over the obstructions which are laid in the paths of the heedless and inattentive; and which can only be avoided by "taking fast hold of instruction," resolved "not to let her go, but to keep her, as our life."

V. 14—27. The counsels of heavenly wisdom continually warn us to keep at a distance from the society and the infectious example of wicked men; and to avoid their path, "passing by it, turning from it, and passing away," being afraid of coming within the reach of their fascinations. There are many in every age who are restless in pursuit of the pleasures and advantages of sin, or in indulging their malice and revenge; who are miserable when they cannot be mischievous to their utmost wish; who riot in excess upon the gains of their fraud, rapine, and oppression, regardless of the groans and tears extorted by their violence, and to support their extravagance and magnificence. This is one way of the wicked, and it is as increasing darkness; and, if persisted in, will speedily and unexpectedly plunge them into final misery and despair. "But the path of the just is as the shining light, which shineth more and more unto the perfect day." Their comforts are continually increasing, their characters perfecting, their sorrows expiring: and the hour of death will only occasion a short interruption of their increasing light, which will suddenly break forth in perfect and eternal day. Let us then be observant of our great teacher, and keep our eye continually upon his directions, and hide them in our inmost souls, "for they are life unto those that find them," and a medicine for all our maladies. But would we make progress in our heavenly path, we must keep our hearts with all diligence, and more sedulously than we do our money, our estates, our habitations, or even our characters; "exercising ourselves to have a conscience void of offence towards God and man." With all vigilance and earnestness, and with unceasing prayer, we should labour, that no evil desire may prevail or abide in our hearts: avoiding everything which poisons this fountain, by exciting pride, envy, malice, avarice, or sensual lusts; crushing the first emotions of such evils, as we would the brood of a scorpion; guarding the avenues of our senses, imagination, and memory; storing up pious instructions, and using every means to render our minds a treasure of holy thoughts and affections, and to increase in them grateful love, reverential fear, hatred of sin, and benevolence in all its delightful exercises; that from within, these holy streams may issue forth, and fructify our whole conduct and conversation. Above all, we should seek from the Lord Jesus, that living water, that sanctifying spirit, which is, in the hearts of believers, "a well of water springing up into everlasting life." Thus we shall be enabled to put away from us a froward mouth and perverse lips; our eyes will be turned away from beholding vanity, and fixed upon our path; looking straight before us, that we may see and shun the snares and devious tracks, into which others are beguiled; pondering the path of our feet, that we may take no false steps, but that all our ways may be established in consistency and propriety; turning neither to the right hand nor to the left; avoiding all extremes; keeping the middle path; removing our feet from every evil thing; walking by the rule of God's word, and observing the cautions, and treading in the steps, of our Lord and Master. In this view, what a beautiful, excellent, and happy thing is Christianity! But, alas! how far do we come short in every particular! Lord, forgive the past, and enable us to follow thee more closely for the time to come!

V. 12—15. Solomon here contrasts the sloth of those who might be profitably employed, with the unwearied application, and wily sagacity, of the sons of Belial, the determined and desperately wicked ; or, he shews how indolence and extravagance make way for a man being gradually led on in sin, through urgent temptations, till he becomes the most abandoned and mischievous of the human species. They who have totally cast off the fear of God, with all regard to justice and honour, form schemes of iniquity, and pursue their object without intermission, by lies, flatteries, slanders, or perjuries. Thus they “walk with a froward mouth.” They form themselves into cabals, and have their secret signs, understood by each other. “So that they wink with their eyes, and speak with their feet, and teach with their fingers.”—The artifices of gamesters and covetous usurers, to draw in young spendthrifts, may be intended. Or the conduct of hypocrites, who, with the language, the attitudes, the affected demure looks, and every action of extraordinary piety, carry on their trade of devouring widows’ houses. Their mouths, and hands, and eyes, and feet, are all employed ; and even in their closet, at the church, and at the Lord’s table, they are pursuing their one object, with lifted eyes, and bended knees, and hands spread forth.—Or, in general, it may mean, that all the powers, faculties, senses, and members of wicked men, are instruments of unrighteousness ; and, according to their different propensities, they pursue their object uniformly ; for frowardness is in their heart, and they are continually devising mischief, and sowing discord, in neighbourhoods and nations, that they may fish in troubled waters ; or because, as the children of the devil, they love mischief for mischief’s sake ; but, by all this, they only ensure their own destruction.

19 'A false witness that speaketh lies, and he that soweth discord among brethren.

20 ¶ My son, 'keep thy father's commandment, and forsake not the law of thy mother :

21 'Bind them continually upon thine heart, and tie them about thy neck.

22 When 'thou goest, it shall lead thee; when thou sleepest, it shall keep thee; and when thou awakest, it shall talk with thee.

23 For 'the commandment is a 'lamp; and the law is light; 'and reproofs of instruction are 'the way of life:

24 To 'keep thee from the evil woman, from the flattery 'of the tongue of a strange woman.

25 'Lust not after her beauty in thine heart: neither let her 'take thee with her eyelids.

26 For 'by means of a whorish woman a man is brought to 'a piece of bread: and 'the adulteress will 'hunt for the precious life.

V. 16-19. These seven abominations seem to have been mentioned by Solomon, as found in the practice of the children of Belial, whom he had been describing; they were sure, therefore, to destroy such as persisted in them, because peculiarly hateful to God the judge of all.

V. 20, 21. These commandments, as given by parents, are supposed to coincide with the precepts of God; and this tacitly instructed parents what injunctions to lay upon their children, and how to exercise their authority.

V. 22. (Note, Deut. vi. 7-9.) 'When thou walkest, lead her forth, that she may be with thee; thus, when thou sleepest let her keep thee, that when thou awakest she may talk with thee. (Sept.)

V. 23. 'Every particular command of God is like a candle, and the whole law is like the light of the sun, to shew thee thy way, and exhilarate thy spirits; nay, the severest reproofs which correct thy errors, and reduce thee to obedience, are the way to the greatest happiness. (Bp. Patrick.)—The words law and commandment are, in such passages, put for revelation in general, and not for any one part of it, as distinguished from others.

V. 25. Eyelids. Either the decorations of painting and attire, or the wanton glances of a licentious woman, which wound and kill, in a far different sense than deluded lovers suppose when they use such expressions.

V. 26. A piece, &c. That is, a fragment or crust of bread; the meanest morsel by which life can be supported. This expression describes that extreme poverty to which fornication often reduces those who have before lived in affluence; as the latter clause of the verse does the fatal effects of adultery.

V. 27-35. Solomon had before intimated, that some of these strange women had 'forsaken the guides of their youth, and forgotten the covenant of their God: but he here particularly considers the consequences of adultery, with a woman that yet lived with her husband. It would be as vain to commit this crime in expectation of escaping detection and punishment; as to take fire into the bosom, and not burn so much as the raiment, or to walk on burning coals and the feet not be burnt. (Notes, &c. Num. v. 11-31.) And indeed no man could be at all familiar with a married woman, without guilt, and a powerful temptation to more atrocious criminality. A thief who stole from mere hunger, might escape contempt, through compassion for his distress: yet he that was caught stealing, was condemned to restore seven-fold, or abundantly, though it might reduce him to poverty or even slavery. But adultery, being a far more intolerable injury, was by the judicial law of God punishable with the death of both parties: it was a proof of a more desperate state of the heart, and could admit of no plea; and it was a more egregious folly, as if a man should at once wilfully murder both his body and soul. In the judgment of all wise and pious men, the adulterer would contract an indelible disgrace; and would involve himself in quarrels that might terminate in bloodshed. For jealousy, when a man knew or suspected himself supplanted in the affections of his wife, and dishonoured by her unfaithfulness to his bed, commonly excited the most implacable rage and resentment. In prosecuting the criminal, the injured husband would demand the rigorous execution of the law, and not regard any ransom, presents, or submissions: and if he failed of obtaining redress from the magistrates, he would be ready to execute vengeance with his own hand upon the injurer. So that he that committed adultery, did it, as one about to destroy his own soul.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1-15. The Scriptures instruct us in discretion, even as to our temporal concerns, for the peace of our own minds, the comfort of domestic life, the welfare of society, and the honour of the gospel: and a life regulated according to the oracles of God exceedingly conduces to our true interest, even in this present world. We are stewards of our worldly substance, and ought not to dispose of any part of it, but by the allowance of our Lord: we hold it in trust, for our families, for the poor, and for the church; with a license to take a portion for our own use, according to our station: but to waste his goods extravagantly, or in rash schemes and speculations, is a very criminal breach of trust. Justice, piety, and charity unitedly call on us to be upon our guard against such engagements, as may entangle us in difficulties and temptations, be injurious to others, or deprive us of the means of being useful. And if any have been thus drawn in; it behoves them to lose no time, spare no pains, and shrink from no difficulties, by which the ruinous effects may be prevented, or mitigated, if possible. But such obligations are sooner entered into than got rid of: and a promise, a letter of credit, or a bond hastily given, may so involve a man, that he can by no means avoid bankruptcy. Hence we learn how much easier it is to ruin than to save ourselves; that our heedless conduct may be long after remembered against us; and that every rash and wicked, yea, every idle, word must be accounted for at the day of judgment. But how base are they, who take advantage of a man's indiscreet partiality, to draw him in to their ruin! Or, who will not submit to every hardship, to extricate the man whom they have thus involved! In these matters our supposed friends often prove strangers to us, and shew that we were strangers to them; and by acting with the cruelty of enemies, painfully teach us to place no confidence in man. If, however, we ought in prudence to stoop, strive, and employ every means, to escape from impending temporal calamities; how should we be in earnest, and make all haste to flee from the wrath to come, and to 'recover ourselves from the snare of the devil, who hath taken us captive at his will! Nor should we forget him, who willingly became our surety, when we were strangers and enemies, though he well knew how dear it would cost him to pay our debt, and ransom our souls, and how ungrateful we should often prove.—It may abate our wonder that sinners should be so negligent in seeking an interest in his great salvation; when we observe how improvident numbers are about the present world. Though we are formed wiser than the animal tribes; yet multitudes voluntarily become more foolish than they, and might learn wisdom from the most despicable of them, if they were not utterly unteachable. Whilst many incessantly weary themselves to gratify an insatiable avarice, numbers can by no means be induced to a proper degree of attention and diligence; though they see abject poverty marching to meet them as an armed man! We may expostulate with such sluggards, and demand of them, how long they mean to waste their hours in sleep, and their days in inactivity? But they will still crave respite, and require 'a little sleep, a little slumber, a little folding of the hands to sleep; and few are recovered from these habits, who have once contracted them. How carefully then should we guard against beginnings, and learn to redeem precious time; to rise early when health permits; and to inure ourselves to diligence and hardiness, in our respective callings! And how carefully should parents and teachers watch over young persons, and prevent their becoming habitually slothful and self-indulgent! But it is still more important, that men should avoid indolence in the concerns of their immortal souls; and that, in the present transient and precarious summer of life and health, they should prepare for the approaching winter of sickness, death, judgment, and eternity. To numbers it may well be said, 'Go to the ant, thou sluggard; consider her ways, and be wise.' 'How long wilt thou sleep, O sluggard? When wilt thou arise out of thy sleep?' 'Awake, thou that sleepest, and arise from the dead, and Christ shall give thee light.' But, alas! they love their sleep of sin, and their soothing dreams of worldly felicity; and crave a little sleep, and to be excused, as yet, from repentance, prayer, self-denial, and diligence: they mean to set about this irksome work some time, but not now: and so they compose themselves again; yet not without imbibing a deep resentment against those officious intruders who attempted to awake them. But their destruction slumbereth not; it approaches every moment, and will ere long come on them with irresistible violence; and when they 'lift up their eyes in hell,' they will have full leisure to rue bitterly their folly. Lord, awaken them to see their danger, whilst yet there is a way of escape! and awake all of us, (for we are yet half asleep, and ready again to close our eyes,) that we may give diligence to ensure our own salvation, and to seize every opportunity of glorifying God, and of doing good to the church, and to the world! For the children of the wicked one are vigilant, diligent, sagacious, and persevering in their schemes of mischief: their heart continually deviseth, their lips utter, and their fingers work, wickedness: their eyes look abroad for their prey, or wink whilst they seize upon it; and they are wholly intent upon their pernicious projects: yet by all this they only serve the cause of Satan, and ensure their own destruction. And shall Christians, who have such prospects, obligations, motives, and examples, be inactive, inconstant, and lukewarm? Shall we neglect those things which the Lord loveth, by which he

CHAP. VIII.

Wisdom calls to the sons of men to hear her invaluable instructions, 1—11. She recommends herself as the giver of numberless blessings, 12—21. She declares her eternity; and that she was present at the creation, as the foundation of Jehovah's counsels and the object of his delight, and as rejoicing in the sons of men, 22—31. She renews her exhortations to hear her words, as the only way to obtain life and the favour of the Lord, and to avoid the wilful ruin of men's own souls, 32—36.

that time, it would serve as an introduction to further crimes, and would probably end in his ruin. So that, (however light licentious poets, actors, and artists, and those who delight in their works and exhibitions, may make of such incidents,) the wisdom of God declares, that the youth went, "as an ox to the slaughter, or as a fool," (or drunkard, who knows not what is going forward,) to be set in the stocks and scourged. Nor would he be aware of his danger, "till a dart should strike through his liver:" and he was as a bird that "hasteth to the snare," for the sake of the bait, "and knoweth not that it is for his life."

V. 26. Wounded. Samson, David, and even Solomon himself, were grievously wounded, and numbers of eminent men have been totally ruined, through such tempters. This seems to intimate that these chapters were written towards the close of Solomon's life. His own example, in taking so many wives, probably had a bad effect upon his people, and their abundant prosperity would tend to inflame the disease. His repeated and pathetic admonitions on this subject must have been very painful to him; and they form no inconsiderable proof of his deep humiliation for his own transgressions.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The instruction of those who speak according to the oracles of God, equally demand our attention with that sacred source from whence they are derived. We should, according to the plainest dictates of common sense, be more careful to keep the law of God in our memory, affections, and conduct, than to preserve our limbs, our senses, or even our lives; and if the Lord guard his people as the pupil of the eye, surely we should pay a similar regard to his precepts; "binding them upon our fingers," ready for use, "and writing them upon the table of our hearts." We are indeed most graciously invited to seek the benefits and honour of relationship unto Christ, by an obedient attention to his word: and thus we may indeed "say to wisdom, thou art my sister, and call understanding our kinswoman." In this way we shall be preserved from the fatal effects of our own passions, and the snares of Satan and of his emissaries. And when we can with pleasure employ our leisure hours in searching the Scriptures, in meditation, pious conversation, and devotion; our time will not hang heavy on our hands, and we shall have no occasion to go in quest of amusement and dissipation, to get rid of it. Wise observers of mankind have always noted that ignorance and inexperience, joined with indolence, and a fondness for roving about and wasting time in vain company, and keeping unseasonable hours, have been inlets to every kind of vice; and they, who thus run themselves into the way of temptation, seldom keep their resolutions of resisting it. For Satan always hath his factors at work, and they who go upon his ground, or near it, will be sure to meet with them.—When women forget the origin and use of raiment, and are fond of decking themselves out in a light manner, to attract the notice and excite the passions of beholders; they are far from being innocent, and they give encouragement to licentious men to accost them with sanguine expectations of success. Indeed, a mere speculator would not think it possible, that any virtuous woman would choose to copy fashions, or to be seen in attire, resembling those of a harlot! This unaccountable indecorum, joined with a gadding and dissipated mind, a dislike to domestic employments, and a forward, loquacious, noisy, untractable disposition, commonly lead to further enormities; and if a man be so unhappy as to be yoked to a female of this description, he must expect trials and sorrow. Such wives often make home uncomfortable to their husbands, and drive them to seek satisfaction elsewhere; and then take that opportunity of more deeply injuring them; using every artifice to inveigle others, and to escape detection. In this view, we should recollect that "a prudent wife is from the Lord:" from him that blessing should be sought, and when granted it demands peculiar gratitude. If once female modesty is surmounted, women commonly become more shamelessly impudent than men; in order to inflame the passions, and overcome the scruples of those whom they address. And when religious ordinances have been perverted from their sacred use, they are often made a cloak of, or occasion for the most enormous crimes; nay, men attend on them, as it were, to purchase license to commit sin with impunity. He who will stay to hear the flatteries, and to admit the caresses, of an artful woman, will scarcely ever be able to resist her allurements, for victory over this temptation can in general by no means be obtained but by flight. (Notes, Gen. xxxix.) And a man may in an unguarded hour be suddenly persuaded, and as it were forced, by fair speeches, to commit those crimes, that will cover his character with infamy, load his conscience with guilt, fill his heart with horror, plunge him into inextricable difficulties, and do immense mischief, even if they do not terminate in his final and eternal ruin. A consciousness of our own weakness, and an habitual recollection of the consequences of such sins, form our best security against them; in subserviency to watchfulness, prayer, and dependence upon the Lord. Let us then hear the salutary words of wisdom, and keep our hearts diligently, that they do not decline to the ways, or wander in the paths, of these seducing destroyers; "whose house is in the way to hell, going down to the chambers of death." And, as many strong, and, in other respects, wise men, have been wounded and slain in this conflict; we must indeed be void of understanding, if we will rashly venture upon it.

NOTES.

CHAP. VIII. V. 1—3. (Notes, i. 20—33.)

V. 4. This address being made, not to the seed of Abraham, or Israel, but to "the sons of men," "the children of Adam," seems an intimation of that more enlarged publication of wisdom's instructions, which hath taken place under the gospel. Men of the highest and of the lowest ranks are also included.—Nothing short of the most public and clear instructions, in the great truths and maxims of revealed religion, can answer the language here employed; and to explain it, as the voice of reason and conscience, or as the moral instructions of men unacquainted with the Scriptures, is, in fact, to make heavenly wisdom declare that revelation is not absolutely necessary to teach men the way of life and salvation.

V. 6—8. None, but the Truth himself, and those inspired men by whom he spake, ever could unreservedly adopt these words without high presumption; especially they cannot suit those philosophers, who indeed taught some useful lessons, but mixed up so much error with them, that the apostle says concerning them, "professing themselves wise, they became fools."

V. 8. (Marg. Ref.) "The word of God is easy to all that have a desire unto it, and are not blinded by the god of this world."

V. 11. (Notes, iii. 16—18.)

V. 12. "What is comparable to a prudent mind, which is not crafty to deceive, but so cautious as not to be deceived?" (Bp. Patrick.)—"Except a man have wisdom, which is the true knowledge of God, he can neither be a prudent nor a good counsellor."—It is most obvious to interpret the rest of this chapter, as the words of the Messiah, speaking in the name of wisdom. Thus most of the ancient fathers explained it; and, though their too curious speculations led them into some difficulties, which have induced others to adopt another mode of interpretation, yet, I can see no well-grounded objection to a sober and cautious explanation of it, on this supposition, nor can any other give full satisfaction; for the things spoken are exclusively applicable to Christ, and must be in great measure explained away, before they can suit any other view of the subject. Indeed, as he communicates divine truth by the sacred Scriptures, many things must accord either with the speaker, or the word spoken; but some parts of this chapter cannot be explained, with propriety, of the sacred oracles. The ingenuity and sagacity, for instance, by which men find out curious and useful inventions, are the gift of God, but not by means of the holy Scriptures, (Marg. Ref.) And if wisdom, as a divine attribute, be intended, why should the personal wisdom and word of God be lost sight of in the exposition, when by him all wisdom is communicated to the sons of men?

V. 13. (Note, Job xxviii. 28.) Though natural knowledge and wisdom be from the same source with divine truth; yet their value is comparatively small, 13 'The fear of the LORD is to hate evil: 'pride, and arrogancy, and the evil way, and 'the froward mouth, do I hate.

14 'Counsel is mine, and "sound wisdom: I am understanding; 'I have strength.

15 'By me kings reign, and princes 'decree justice.

16 By me princes rule, and nobles, even all the judges of the earth.

17 'I love them that love me; and 'those that seek me early shall find me.

18 'Riches and honour are with me; 'yea, 'durable riches, 'and righteousness.

19 My 'fruit is better than gold, yea, than fine gold; and my revenue than choice silver.

20 'I 'lead in the way of righteousness, 'in the midst of the paths of judgment:

21 That I may cause those that love me 'to inherit substance; and I will 'fill their treasures.

22 ¶ The LORD 'possessed me in the beginning of his way, before his works of old.

23 I was 'set up from everlasting, from the beginning, or over the earth was.

24 When there were no depths 'I was brought forth; when there were no fountains abounding with water.

25 Before 'the mountains were settled, before the hills was I brought forth:

26 While 'as yet he had not made the earth, nor the 'fields, nor the 'highest part of the dust of the world.

27 When 'he prepared the heavens, I was there: when he set a 'compass upon the face of the depth:

28 When he established the clouds above: when he strengthened the fountains of the deep:

29 When 'he gave to the sea his decree, that the waters should not pass his commandment: 'when he appointed the foundations of the earth:

30 Then I was by him, as 'one brought up with him: and 'I was daily his delight, rejoicing always before him;

31 Rejoicing in the habitable part of his earth; 'and my delights were with the sons of men.

32 ¶ Now therefore hearken unto me, O ye children; 'for blessed are they that keep my ways.

33 'Hear instruction, and be wise, and 'refuse it not.

34 Blessed is the man that heareth me, 'watching daily at my gates, waiting at the posts of my doors.

35 For 'whoso findeth me findeth life, and shall 'obtain 'favour of the LORD.

36 But 'he that sinneth against me, wrongeth his own soul: 'all they that hate me love death.

37 'The fear of the LORD is the beginning of wisdom, and the knowledge of the Holy One is understanding.

38 'The fear of the LORD is the beginning of wisdom, and the knowledge of the Holy One is understanding.

39 'The fear of the LORD is the beginning of wisdom, and the knowledge of the Holy One is understanding.

40 'The fear of the LORD is the beginning of wisdom, and the knowledge of the Holy One is understanding.

41 'The fear of the LORD is the beginning of wisdom, and the knowledge of the Holy One is understanding.

42 'The fear of the LORD is the beginning of wisdom, and the knowledge of the Holy One is understanding.

43 'The fear of the LORD is the beginning of wisdom, and the knowledge of the Holy One is understanding.

44 'The fear of the LORD is the beginning of wisdom, and the knowledge of the Holy One is understanding.

45 'The fear of the LORD is the beginning of wisdom, and the knowledge of the Holy One is understanding.

46 'The fear of the LORD is the beginning of wisdom, and the knowledge of the Holy One is understanding.

47 'The fear of the LORD is the beginning of wisdom, and the knowledge of the Holy One is understanding.

V. 26. 'Before he had put it into this form of lofty mountains and spacious plains; no, there was not the first atom of this globe on which you read.' (Bp. Patrick.) By the highest or chief part, we may understand the formation of man. He was, as to his body, only dust; though the chief and noblest of the dust of the world.

V. 30. 'Then was I present by him, as one that was coeternal with him; and we did mutually and infinitely solace each other from everlasting.' (Bp. Hall.)—The word rendered brought up with him, is by some translated, cherished as in his bosom. Wisdom had said that she was begotten; now she adds, that she was in the bosom of the Father. Thus the apostle, (John i. 18) "the only begotten Son, who is in the bosom of the Father;" "who never was separated from the Father, always saw the Father; who "seeth what the Father doeth, that he may do the like," (with the same will and power); in whom the Father places his pleasure and delight; willing that, by the Son, we should approach to him, in the Son we should honour and adore him, and honour the Son as himself."—Some, however, render the word actively, a nourisher, or a chief worker; "signifying that this wisdom, even Jesus Christ, was equal with God the Father; and createth, preserveth, and still worketh with him." (Notes, John v. 17—30. Marg. Ref.)—It is observable, that some of those learned men who seem inclined to exclude this interpretation, pass over these remarkable expressions without much notice; and, indeed, deal in general language, to which the reader finds it difficult to annex any precise meaning, except that he will perceive that the divine attribute of wisdom is supposed to be the speaker; but it is not determined in what way her instructions are communicated.

V. 31. 'For man's sake the divine Wisdom took man's nature, and dwelt among us, and filled us with unspeakable treasures; and this is that solace (or delight) which is here spoken of.'—Wisdom not only rejoiced in the creation of the world, and man formed in the image of God; but "in the habitable parts of the earth," and "in the sons of Adam:" but the earth was not inhabited, nor had Adam any sons, till after the fall; and it is with respect to redemption, that the wisdom of God, in any sense of the term, can be said to take "its delights" among the fallen race of Adam. The Redeemer, therefore, here evidently speaks of "the joy set before him," in the glorious event of his sufferings, to the honour of God, and the salvation of the souls of men; and on that account he immediately uses it, as an argument why they should attend to him.

'With joy I saw the mansion where 'The sons of men should dwell.'
'My busy thoughts at first—
'On their salvation ran,
Ere sin was born, or Adam's dust,
'Was fashioned to a man.
'Then come receive my grace,
'Ye children, and be wise.
'Happy the man that keeps my ways,
'The man that shuns them dies.' (Watts.)

V. 34. Daily. The word of God, and the places where the gospel is faithfully preached, without doubt, are "the gates" "and the posts of the doors" of wisdom, at which Christ would have his disciples to wait daily. Many in this lukewarm age, question the propriety of hearing sermons on a week-day, and not only absent themselves, but censure those who attend. A few questions may be proposed on this subject. Do such persons generally employ their time better? If other duties demand their attention, they certainly do.

But may not Christians, consistently with other duties, redeem time for waiting at Wisdom's gate, as well as the children of this world find time for their vain amusements and feasting, who yet do not neglect their one thing needful? Is not the time, spared from attending on a sermon on a week-day, often spent in unprofitable visits or vain discourse? nay, does it not frequently hang heavy on men's hands, and prove a temptation to various scenes of dissipation? And is this more for the honour of God, the good of men's own souls, or the edification of their brethren? Did Christ ever find fault with his hearers for attending him too closely? Were Christians less judicious or more zealous, after the day of Pentecost, than at present? (Acts, ii. 42, 46, 47.) Doth it not shew a degree of contempt of Wisdom's instructions, and form a bad example, when people professing godliness seem glad of an excuse for neglecting the means of grace? And, finally, ought ministers to be "instant in season, and out of season," in preaching the word; and ought not the people to be glad of an opportunity of hearing it?

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1-21. When we observe how readily men listen to the seductions of vice, and run in the ways of folly and misery; we are apt to suppose, that the instructions of wisdom are withheld from them, and that they would act otherwise if not left to unavoidable ignorance. Indeed, the supporters of superstition and error have devised many ways to keep men in the dark, or to furnish them with excuses for impenitency and unbelief; and many have pretended that there is vast uncertainty respecting the knowledge of the truth and will of God, or difficulty in acquiring it. But the chief difficulty, and indeed almost the only one, is to induce men to attend on instruction. "For doth not wisdom cry? and understanding put forth her voice?" It was the manner of Christ and his apostles, and it is that of all his faithful ministers, according to their measure of ability, to publish his truths in the most earnest and open manner; to spread divine instructions, by every means and in every place where they can; and to warn, exhort, and call upon men to hearken to them. For without restriction Wisdom calls upon all the sons of Adam, who come within the reach of her voice. She commands "the simple to understand wisdom, and the fools to be of an understanding heart;" and an obedient attention to the words of Christ will guide the most ignorant into the saving knowledge of the truth. But, alas! men are far more desirous of diversion than of instruction: and places, where folly keeps her school, and demands a high price for admission, are thronged; whilst the gospel of Christ, freely but faithfully preached, without the trappings of human oratory, will comparatively be thinly attended. Yet the condescension of the holy Saviour, in addressing his words, not to angels, but to the fallen sons of men, and to the vilest and meanest of them, demands our strictest regard: and the excellent things that he speaks are worthy to be received by all rational creatures; but especially by sinners, to whom he points out the only way of life and salvation. Every word he utters, is right; his lips abominate all guile and wickedness; there is nothing froward or perverse in his instructions; they give no needless pain, impose no useless restraints, demand no unreasonable services, and engage us in no abstruse speculations. There is no insincerity in his invitations, or unfaithfulness in his promises, or unkindness in his precepts. And if his words be unintelligible to any, it is, because they do not fear the Lord; (Ps. xxv. 14); they are not willing to be the disciples of Christ, or to do the will of God, (Matt. xiii. 11. John, vii. 17.; 2 Cor. iv. 3, 4); or they do not put a proper value on the knowledge of the truth, and bestow due pains to acquire it. For when there is an understanding heart, and a disposition to receive the truth in love, it is all plain and obvious, and every preceding lesson prepares the mind for those which are to follow. Such persons value wisdom above silver and gold; they count all things but loss for the excellency of the knowledge of Christ: for him they forsake the world, and renounce the most lucrafive employments at his command: for they deem "wisdom better than rubies, and all the things that may be desired, as not to be compared to it."—Indeed, they know that all prudence and ingenuity are from their Lord; and that, if he saw it good for them, he could discover to them such curious inventions, as would render them eminent among men: but they most admire that wisdom by which he hath made way for the salvation of sinners, consistently with the honour of the divine law and justice. For through the redemption of his precious blood "the riches of his grace have abounded in all wisdom and prudence." (Eph. i. 8.) Counsel and sound wisdom are with and from him; but the pride and arrogance, the evil ways and the froward conversation, which he hates, render men unwilling to be his pupils, and close their minds against his humbling, awakening, and holy instructions. He has strength also, as well as understanding; and being the fountain of authority, he can advance his friends, and crush his foes, at pleasure: and as by him kings reign, it be- comes them not only to decree justice, and to exercise their authority according to his precepts, but to come and trust in him for the salvation of their souls, (Notes, Ps. ii.)—Our love to Christ, as expressed by obedience to his commandments and delight in his instructions, is the sure evidence of his love of us; and all, that seek him without delay, shall find him as their teacher and Saviour. They are peculiarly happy who begin early in life to seek "him: for true riches and honours are with him, yea, durable riches and righteousness: whereas the vanishing possessions of this world are often acquired by injustice, and prove dangerous temptations. The fruit of this tree of life is far better than gold; and even the present comforts of his people surpass all that wealth can purchase. He leads those whom he loves in the paths of righteousness, at a distance from perilous extremes, even in the midst of the paths of judgment; that he may cause them to inherit, not vain shadows, but substantial good, sufficient to satisfy all the capacities and desires of their souls.

V. 22-36. The consideration of the essential and eternal dignity of the condescending Saviour should greatly endear his instructions to us. From eternity being one with the Father, the Creator and Lord of all; by whom and for whom all things were made and disposed of, with a view to the glory of God in the work of man's redemption: having displayed his wisdom, power, and goodness, in the formation of the heavens and the earth, and all things therein; he was yet willing to stoop, and to assume the form of a servant for us men and for our salvation. In the prospect of man's lost estate, he was set up from everlasting in the Divine counsels, to be our Deliverer and King: and though well aware of the vast expense of this gracious work, he rejoiced in anticipating the glory that should follow his agonies, and in the delight he should for ever take in his redeemed people, the trophies of his victories, and the monuments of his love. Did he then, and doth he still delight in the thoughts of thus saving us wretched sinners? Did the Father, on this account especially, delight in his beloved Son? And shall not we delight in him and his salvation? Surely with the docility of children we should hearken to his voice: yea, the youngest, that can read, hear, and understand, should receive his counsels with thankful, joyful, and obedient hearts. Let us all then hear instruction, and be wise, and not refuse such surprising mercy. For blessed are they, who hear the Saviour's voice; patiently watching and waiting at his gates: and by daily reading, meditation, and prayer, by constantly attending on his ordinances and observing his directions, seek increasing acquaintance with him, and experience of his grace. The more diligent we are, the happier we shall be: for "whoso findeth him findeth life, and shall obtain favour of the LORD." Let us then not be wearied or discouraged in watching at his gates: let us be careful that we be not allured away by worldly pleasures, frightened away by the reproach or terror of the wicked, or tempted to think, that we shall wait in vain; for this no upright soul shall do: but they, that neglect such great salvation, and hate the instructions of Christ, are murderers of their own souls, and act as if they were in love with death and dam- nation.

NOTES.

CHAP. IX. V. 1—6. Perhaps Solomon here referred to his magnificent temple, to which men were invited to resort for the worship of God instead of frequenting scenes of vice and dissipation: but even this was typical of Christ and his gospel.—He, the true wisdom, hath prepared his church and ordinances, as a commodious and stately palace, for the entertainment of believing sinners. The sacrifice of his death, which was prefigured by the oblations of bulls and goats, supplies the provisions of a rich and plentiful feast for them. The wine also is mingled, to render it more exquisite; and the table is furnished at a vast expense to him, though none to them. The ministers of the gospel, (called the handmaids of wisdom, to preserve the propriety of the parable,) are sent forth into all the places of public resort, to invite the guests: and the simple, those who want understanding, (or a heart, as the words literally signify,) are particularly invited to enter in, and partake of the feast. But they must be exhorted and commanded to forsake their foolish comrades and sinful pursuits, that they may live and be happy, by going in the way of understanding. The coincidence of this interpretation with two of our Lord's parables, sufficiently warrants it; (Notes, Matt. xxii. 2—14. Luke xiv. 16—24;) and indeed the exposition given of the preceding chapters.—The Son of God, who is the eternal wisdom of the Father, hath built his house, the church of God; he hath laid sure foundations of it, and hath hewn out all the pillars thereof. He hath instituted all his holy ordinances, whereby he may feed up the souls of men to everlasting life. He hath sent forth his holy and zealous messengers, to invite men to these sacred mysteries." (Bp. Hall.)

V. 7—9. These verses seem to imply directions to the ministers of Christ, whilst they invite sinners in general, how to conduct themselves towards men according to the way in which they treat their warnings and invitations. They must be contented with declaring the truth before them, as they have opportunity, and with general warnings and exhortations; but must not persist in personal rebukes of those, who shew profane contempt, or are notorious for their wickedness; as that will only render them more outrageous and scurrilous, perhaps excite them to circulate slanders out of revenge, and induce such altercations, as may even exasperate the reprover to say or do things that will give them a handle against him: so that nothing can be generally expected from reproving a scorner, but reproach, contempt, and hatred. Whereas there is the greatest encouragement to reprove a wise man when he acts improperly; for he will love the friendly reprover, and grow wiser by every instruction. And as teachableness, and a conscientious regard to the authority of God, are proofs of wisdom; so the attention of instructors should be peculiarly directed to those, who seem disposed to profit by particular addresses. But where obstinacy and contempt of the truth are manifest, Christ says to us, "Let them alone;" "you can do them no good at present, but will get harm by them." "If a man cannot endure to be told of his faults, it is a shrewd sign he is in the way to be undone; and hath not so much as approached the gates of wisdom." (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 10. Holy. Or, holies; holy things, or holy persons, or perhaps of the holy God, and of his truth and will. (Is. vi. 3.)

V. 13—18. The foolish woman seems here to be an emblem, either of sensual pleasures, and the cares, interests, and pursuits of the world: or, of those idolatrous and erroneous religions, which, making large allowances to men's depraved inclinations, allure them from "the truth as it is in Jesus." In this foolish woman, clamorousness and ignorance unite with high pretensions and noisy declamations and boasting, that mean nothing. She is represented as continually seated in the high places of the city, to draw aside those who were before going on their way; as the harlot entices men who were following their business without previous bad intentions. Some think that she represents the conscientious scruples of those whom she addresses, as simplicity and want of understanding, in the manner that the bashful virtuous youth is often made the fool in a comedy: or it is shewn that she singles out and prevails against such, as are destitute of wisdom and grace, alluring them into the ways of sin, with an enchanting delineation of the pleasure to be found in prohibited indulgences; as if the forbidden fruit were to be desired above any in the garden of God. Thus men are drawn from Christ, and are not aware that it is to their destruction; not knowing, that all who hearken to the seductions of vice or error are dead in sins, and that the guests are rushing into the depths of hell. (Note, ii. 18.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

As the divine majesty of Christ, and the excellency of his instructions, demand our obedient attention; so the provisions of his grace to supply our perishing wants should endear his invitations. This new covenant which he hath mediated, the spiritual house he hath built, the atoning sacrifice he hath offered, the inexhaustible treasures reposed in him; the righteousness, grace, peace, and consolations, which he bestows; the eternal inheritance that he hath prepared; and the meetness for it which his grace effects, are freely proposed to sinners, and conferred on every believer. Whatever carnal men imagine, Christ hath provided a feast for his people; nothing is wanting but a willing mind and a spiritual relish, in order to partake of it: and the invitations given by his faithful ministers to the simple and sinful, imply a direction to them, to call on the Lord for these preparatory blessings.—Would we partake of wisdom's feast, we must renounce the society and the foolish pleasures of the ungodly; or we never can enjoy the pleasures of a holy life, or go in the way of understanding: and it is vain for us to continue an acquaintance with wicked men in order to do them good; as we are far more likely to be corrupted by them; and our best service to them, is to protest against their evil courses by separating from their company. This is in general the only rebuke that it is advisable to give to infidels, scorners, and hardened profligates. It is indeed grievous for a minister by silence and distance to testify against those who despise his message; but seldom any thing, save contempt and reviling, and increased enmity, is got by neglecting this counsel of wisdom: whereas the same labour and freedom taken with those who are wise enough to value instructions, would procure love, and do important good. For none are so wise or righteous, as not in many things to need instruction, and even reproofs: and the wiser men are, the better will they take, and the more will they profit by them if properly given, and by those whose place it is to "reprove and rebuke with all authority." (Ps. cxli. 5.)—We are repeatedly reminded that the fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom; we should therefore discover, as well as we can, where this fear is planted in men's hearts, that we may lead them forward in the knowledge of God, and into an acquaintance with the holy Jesus; in which all true wisdom and understanding consist, and by which all the blessings of time and eternity are communicated. All, who hear the gospel should consider, that life and death are set before them, and that they are most deeply interested in the choice. If they are wise to choose the one thing needful, ministers and Christian friends; yea angels, will rejoice, and God himself will rejoice over them to do them good; and their wisdom will prove their own eternal advantage: but if men persist in their scorning, they may grieve the hearts of their ministers and friends; yet they alone must bear the consequence in everlasting contempt and misery. We ought then most earnestly to seek and pray for true wisdom: for Satan hath emissaries of various kinds to withdraw our souls from Christ, with great swelling words of vanity, the result of presumption and ignorance; (2 Pet. ii. 10—22. Jude 10. 16.) Not only do worldly lusts and abandoned seducers prove fatal rivals to Christ for the souls of men; but false teachers, with damnable doctrines, which flatter the pride and give liberty to the lusts of men, compass the destruction of multitudes. These especially draw off such as have received serious impressions, and are disposed to do many things, and to attend on the word of God; but are not experimentally acquainted with the truth, in the love and power of it: such unstable souls are soon seduced into superstition, enthusiasm, or antinomian licentiousness, or any other plausible corruption of Christianity, according to the fashion of the age: they are persuaded by fair words, that so much diligence and self-denial are unnecessary, and that they may obtain heaven on easier terms: they are allured with the hopes of gratifying their darling passion with impunity; and their natural propensity to covet forbidden objects is readily wrought upon. Thus they are prejudiced against the humbling truths and holy precepts of God's word, and are drawn aside into the ways of error; "not knowing that the dead are there, and that her guests are in the depths of hell;" for "the last state of such men is worse than the first."—From all the deceits of the world, the flesh, and the devil; from all false doctrine and hardness of heart; and from all contempt of thy word and commandment; good Lord, deliver us. Amen.

NOTES.

CHAP. X. V. 1. Here the proverbs, properly so called, begin; which are short maxims of wisdom relating to our conduct in life, in subservency to our own best interests, to the benefit of mankind, and, above all, to the glory of God.—The comfort of parents greatly depends on the conduct of their children, and this suggests to both parents and children powerful motives for attending to their several duties. The heaviness of the mother may be mentioned; because mothers have previously had a more abundant share of pain and sorrow about their children; and it is therefore the more cruel in them, when grown up, to occasion further distress by their subsequent misconduct, to such kind friends, whom they ought by all means to requite; and to whom they should aim in every thing to be a comfort.

V. 2, 3. Great riches, gotten by fraud or oppression, or spent in wickedness, do no real good to the possessor; for the Lord will soon tear them from him, or him from them; and he will cast them away as worthless and contemptible, and utterly insufficient to ransom the life or soul. Yet, such riches are the most valued substance of ungodly men! But, on the other hand, righteousness, (the nature of which must be learned from other parts of Scripture,) secures a man from the sting and fatal effects of death: and, though the righteous should be poor in this world, the Lord, who provides for his soul, will not famish him as to his temporal life.—These verses may be connected with the preceding verse: 'Let the father's care in educating his children be equal to the joy he will have in their well-doing; and let the mother beware that her indulgence does not spoil them, for she will have the greatest share of the heaviness which their untowardness will give.—This is more necessary than the care of heaping up riches for them, which many times tempt men to fraud and oppression,' &c. (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 4. The words rendered "with a slack hand," may signify the hand of deceit: without diligence, honesty can scarcely be expected. 'Next unto virtue, let children be trained up to industry, for both poverty and fraud are commonly the effect of sloth.' (Bp. Patrick.)—The Septuagint here adds, 'a well-educated son shall be a wise man, and shall use the foolish man as a servant.'

V. 5. Activity and sobriety in youth will enable a man to requite his parents, and render him a credit and comfort to them; as well as establish his credit for prudence. But the sluggard will be a scandal and grief to those by whom he hath been educated.

V. 6. Violence. The consciousness or detection of their violent dealing, in oppressing the poor, will stop the mouths of the wicked, and render them like men whose faces are covered when led to execution. 'When their wickedness shall be discovered, they shall be dumb, and not know what to say.'—The clause, however, may be rendered, "the mouth of the wicked covereth violence." They use a variety of pleas, and employ all their eloquence to conceal or excuse and justify their cruelty and oppressions. For example, who can help thinking of the ingenious, but interested advocates for the cruel and oppressive slave-trade?

V. 7. The memory of righteous and merciful men shall be celebrated with just commendations, after their deaths, however clouded by envy and calumny at present; but all the endeavours of the wicked and their panegyrist to establish their characters, shall not preserve their memory from merited infamy.

V. 8. True wisdom disposes men to regard and obey the commandments of God, and those of their superiors in all things lawful; but that knowledge, which merely serves to furnish men with topics of disputation and loquacity, and their various methods of abusing the gift of speech, will redound to their own disgrace and misery.—'The foolish in talk shall be beaten.'

V. 9. (Notes, Ps. cxxv. 5.) The upright believer goes straight forward in the plain path of sincerity, honesty, and piety; thus he is both safe, and free from perplexing fears, as there is no secret ill design or practice which dreads detection; but the dissembler, after all his shuffling and subtlety, will certainly be exposed, either here or hereafter; and he lives in continual apprehensions of being put to shame.

V. 10. (Notes, vi. 12-19.) 'The dissembling person causeth much sorrow at last, both to himself and those that have been deceived by him; but a prating fool, that utters all his heart, procures stripes to himself, without further danger to others.' (Bp. Hall.)

V. 11. The good treasure of a righteous man's heart continually furnishes wise, pious, and edifying observations. So that they who converse with him may draw from him instructions for the prudent conduct of life, as occasion requires. But the mouth of the wicked is employed in disguising or palliating his violent dealings, (Note, 6.)

V. 12. Where hatred reigns, every trifle excites contentions; the least slip is resented and aggravated; the best meant words or actions are misrepresented or misunderstood, and nothing is passed over. But, where love prevails, mistakes and offences will be either overlooked, or speedily forgiven; so that notwithstanding the imperfections of those who live together, they bear with and make the best of each other, and peace and harmony are preserved. The evident meaning of this latter clause should be kept in mind by all who would interpret the apostle's quotation of it. The Septuagint not having clearly expressed the genuine meaning of the passage, St. Peter does not quote from it, but he gives us the plain meaning of the original; and St. James, in an evident reference to the passage, uses almost the same words. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 13. The translation of this verse in the Septuagint is remarkable. 'He, who bringeth forth wisdom from his lips, smites the foolish man with a rod.' Obsolete sinners should be treated with severity; for such discipline is most calculated to do them good; and, indeed, they are wilfully preparing misery for themselves in this world, and in the next.—'He that would be wise must seek the acquaintance of some intelligent person; but, he that is void of consideration, will never learn, unless, perhaps, by some great affliction.' (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 14. Wise men are always learning; they value useful knowledge as misers do gold, and are continually studying to increase their treasures, which they carefully preserve, till opportunities are afforded of communicating them to the instruction of others. But fools soon speak out all they think, and spend their scanty stock, without regarding consequences; by which they do immense mischief, and ruin themselves.—The word rendered destruction, properly means consternation, or anguish of mind.

V. 15. Riches, indeed, often preserve men from many hardships and injuries; and poverty exposes men to much oppression and injustice. But the rich confide far too much in this security, which cannot ward off pain, death, or damnation; and the poor are too much cast down by their difficulties, which cannot prevent their comfort in the favour of God, or the salvation of their souls. (xviii. 11.) The same word is used as in the foregoing verse, and the clause may be rendered, "the consternation of the poor is their poverty;" they are often more afraid of it, than of sin.

V. 16. The labour of the righteous, being a part of their duty, not only supplies their present wants, but tends to their salvation. While the most valuable inheritances, the extraordinary successes, and every unexpected accession of wealth and preferment, with which a wicked man is favoured, serve only to inflame his passions, and supply him with materials of sinful indulgence; and thus eventually they add to his guilt and condemnation.—The verse may be rendered: "That which a righteous man obtaineth by his labour, is unto life: but the income, (or revenue,) "of the wicked, unto sin."

V. 17. Erretteth. The traveller who has missed his way, and is too proud to hearken to directions, is likely to wander still further from his road: and the sinner who disdains to be reproved, will scarcely be convinced of his mistake, till he opens his eyes in the pit of destruction. Some understand the clause actively, 'He that leaveth off to give reproofs encourages men in their errors,' (or causeth them to err.) (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 18. The man who flatters those whom he hates, and covers malicious devices with professions of friendship, and then propagates slanders to the ruin of their reputation, is evidently destitute both of wisdom and grace.

V. 19. 'Much speaking is rarely innocent: therefore he that is sparing of his words, and considers well both when, and where, and what he speaks, is a truly prudent person.' (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 20, 21. Yet the gift of speech is too valuable a talent to be buried: like the precious metals, it should not be squandered; but on proper occasions it should be liberally used. And indeed the righteous, though poor, will by their pious conversation do as much good, as the rich man by his bounty; so that their lips feed, that is, instruct, counsel, and comfort many. But the wicked man, being destitute of good principles, intentions, and dispositions; nay, his heart being worthless and full of iniquity, cannot be expected to do good, either by his example or conversation: and at last he will perish as a fool, for want of true wisdom, whatever proficiency he has made in science, and whatever reputation for sagacity he has acquired.

V. 22. In a chapter peculiarly recommending industry, the wise man, or rather the Spirit of God by him, has given a most important admonition in this verse. 'The heathens were prone to imagine all things requisite to happiness to be placed in themselves. But the Scripture every where inculcates, that it is God who giveth wisdom to the wise, and victory to the valiant, and riches to the diligent, and good success to the prudent and potent.' (Bp. Patrick.) In fact, a large majority of nominal Christians, especially the active, sagacious, and managing, in worldly business, are heathens, at least practically, in this respect. Perhaps they acquire their wealth by using many sinister methods; and with it they ensure vanity and vexation. But when riches are given, by the blessing of God, upon the honest industry of one who depends on him, and uses them to his glory, they are possessed without perplexing care, or a guilty conscience, or dread of consequences.

V. 23. Foolish and wicked men divert themselves with injuring and disquieting others, or with tempting them to sin; and the greatest impieties or iniquities, which they can commit with present impunity, are to them a laughing matter. But a man of understanding is too wise to act so ridiculously; nay, he finds far more delight in wisdom than they do in mischief.

27 The <sup>h</sup>“fear of the LORD <sup>i</sup>“prolongeth days: but <sup>j</sup>the years of the wicked shall be shortened.

V. 24. The most overwhelming dread which a wicked man feels of punishment, will certainly come upon him: and the largest desires that the righteous can form of spiritual and eternal blessings, will assuredly be granted. “He,” even God, “will grant them.” The one can fear nothing so bad, and the other can desire nothing so good, as are really intended for them.

V. 25. The triumphs and boastings of prosperous sinners, resemble the short-lived mischievous fury of a whirlwind, which soon spends itself and is gone. But the righteous has an everlasting foundation, trusting in the mercy of God through Christ unto eternal life.

V. 26. As vinegar, or the sour grape, sets the teeth on edge, and as smoke causes the eyes to smart, so the sluggard is a continued vexation to those who employ him.

V. 27. (Note, iii. 2.)

V. 28. “The hope of the former,” (the righteous,) “concludes in the joyful possession of what he waits for; but the other, failing of his expectation, ends his days in sadness.” (Bp. Patrick.)—It should also be added, that a well-grounded hope is in itself a source of present gladness: “rejoicing in hope.”

V. 29. By uprightly walking in the way of the Lord, habits of obedience acquire strength: and thus the believer, instead of fainting and wearying, through difficulties or temptations, grows stronger in faith and grace, and goes forward with increasing vigour and delight.—Some understand the word to mean courage rather than strength.—“The upright man has great courage and undaunted resolution, when any evil threatens him: but the workers of iniquity are broken with the fear of that destruction which is coming on them.” (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 30. Inhabit. The wicked would be glad to have this earth for their perpetual home and inheritance: but it cannot be so, they must die, and leave their idols behind them; and they have no title to that inheritance which Canaan typified.

V. 31. “The mouth of the just shall be fruitful in wisdom.” (Old Translation.) As the perverseness, lies, malice, slanders, perjuries, and impieties, of a wicked man, might be justly punished by cutting out his tongue; so the froward tongue of the ungodly man shall be silenced, and punished in the flames of hell.

V. 32. The righteous know how to speak what is pleasing to God, in that way which is also most acceptable to men. (Marg. Ref.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—16. If parents would not experience heaviness from their children, but gladness, they should be very attentive to their education, both giving them good instructions, and setting them good examples; they should far more desire, that their children may be wise and pious, than rich or renowned; and they ought to pray for them without ceasing to the giver of every good and perfect gift. It is likewise important, in the greatest degree, that they should consult the permanent advantage of their children, rather than their inclinations, and early habituate them to self-denial and industry. For without diligence there can be no wisdom, or even justice: and a sluggard is always a reproach to those who had the care of his education, a vexation to those who employ him, a dead weight on society, and a burden to himself.—Young persons also ought to recollect the labour and sorrow, which they have already cost their parents; and consider that they may, nay, must, if they behave ill, give them still deeper disquietude and anguish. On the other hand, they should endeavour so to behave, as to prove both a comfort and credit to them. They should apply to business with redoubled alacrity, from this motive especially, that, if needful, they may be able to support their parents during their declining years.—Opportunities once lost can seldom be recalled. In temporal concerns, “he who dealeth with a slack hand becomes poor,” though he had fair prospects and considerable property: so many, highly favoured with religious advantages, will sink into final misery through sloth and procrastination. Indeed, partial negligence will impoverish the soul, and prevent the Christian from enjoying that confidence and consolation, and being honoured with that usefulness, with which his more diligent brother is favoured. Nay, sloth and self-indulgence are here far more culpable and pernicious, and diligence far more valuable, than in the trifles of this world: for riches are not to be compared with righteousness, or temporal things with eternal. Riches, how vast soever, when connected (as the case is too generally,) with wickedness, cannot eventually profit any man: nor can the righteous, in any wise, want what is good for him, either here or hereafter. The confidence that the wealthy generally place in affluence, will certainly disappoint them; for the Lord will cast their idolized treasure away with disdain, “in the hour of death, and in the day of judgment:” and how worthless are all advantages which must forsake us when we most need their help! But then the righteousness of the despised servants of God will appear in its inestimable value, and all will either envy or congratulate them. In the mean time, should they be called to hard labour and mean fare, even this shall conduce to their good.—It is not easy to estimate the blessings which the righteous enjoy, in answer to the prayers of their brethren, while the confusion and frivolous pleas of the wicked, when attempting to palliate their crimes, form an awful anticipation of their unspeakable anguish, when they shall stand speechless before the Judge, and be sent away into everlasting punishment.—Indeed, it is of no consequence to any man, either in heaven or hell, what his fellow-creatures say or think of him: but it is our duty to honour the memory of the righteous, and in general they are honoured after their decease; competition, and envy, and enmity, dying with them: and this honour is a token of their felicity in a better world; while infamy commonly is, and always ought to be, the lot of the wicked, and it will certainly be their doom in the eternal state.—It is of vast moment, exactly to discriminate the characters of the righteous and the wicked; and we can hardly touch on any subject, which does not direct us in so doing.—The wise in heart, that is, the righteous, first practises what he has learned, and then speaks to the edification of his neighbours: but the wicked is loquacious and vain-glorious; and he talks, sometimes fluently and plausibly, on the deepest mysteries, while he neglects the plainest and most important duties. Indeed, there is no small number of these “prating fools,” even among those that profess, nay, preach, the gospel. Yet are they all, every moment, liable to fall into destruction.—Again, the righteous treasures up useful knowledge, and bestows pains to render all he knows useful; and if he has any genius or eloquence, he employs it in recommending truth and enforcing holiness. But the wicked, according to the particular kind of vice to which he is addicted, perversely uses his talents to varnish over crimes, and palliate enormities. The righteous man simply and honestly walks in the ways of God; but the hypocrite has always something in his conduct, which requires concealment, and dreads detection.—The righteous man is long-suffering, forgiving, and kind; tender to the faults of others, and only severe on his own. He follows peace, and the love of his brother is a mantle to “cover all sins:” but the wicked is Clement to himself, and severe on others. Self-love is his mantle, to cover his own sins; envy or hatred prompts him to expose the faults of others, and to stir up strife and contention. And if he be rich, this increases his vain confidence and carnal security, while he despises the poor, though pious, instead of relieving their distresses, and giving them encouragement and protection.—And, finally, while the righteous employ the fruit of their labours in doing good, the wicked spend their estates, or large incomes, “in making provision for the flesh to fulfil the lusts thereof.”

V. 17—32. Whatever may have been the character and conduct of a man hitherto; if indeed he begins seriously to receive the instruction of the sacred oracles, and to obey them, he is in the way of life, or shall soon find admission at the strait gate: but, alas! multitudes having gone wrong are determined to proceed, however palpable and egregious their errors. Thus they refuse reproof and hate the reprover; and this discourages numbers, that they leave men to the most fatal mistakes, for fear of offending them. So that the world is little stored with such as can and will give, and such as meekly and humbly receive, the reproof of life. Alas! flattery and slander are far more common: and they who hide hatred with lying lips, generally spread slanders also, and often concerning the very persons whom they most flatter. But the word of inspiration has called such men fools; and the day of judgment will shew how justly.—How different the character of the truly wise and righteous man! He learns to bridle and govern his tongue, and to avoid all corrupt, false, ill-tempered, and useless conversation: yet, he will not (in refraining his lips, from a conviction, that in the multitude of words there is wanting not sin,) neglect to improve the talent intrusted to him.—Wisdom is found in his lips; his words are as choice silver, enriching, and as wholesome provisions feeding, many. His wise counsels and cautions, his reproofs, instructions, and encouragements, will be acceptable and useful: and while his grand object is to glorify God; he aims also to “please all men for their edification,” and to propose truth in the most winning and attracting manner.—This is his joy and delight: thus his lips are fruitful in wisdom, and many will remember his words, for their good, when his tongue is silent in the grave.—But what a contrast to this character is that of the fool, whose joy and sport is sin and mischief! who pours forth frowardness, malice, lies, reproaches, and profaneness, without fear or concern; and the effect of whose daily conversation, in exciting contentions, and propagating delusions and impiety, exceeds all calculation! Indeed, it is the character of the fool, to use his scantling of capacity in doing mischief. Here alone he manifests any sagacity or ingenuity: and here indeed a little ingenuity will go far, “for behold how great a matter a little fire kindleth!”—Men that are slow to hear, swift to speak, swift to wrath; implacable in resentments, and delighting in contentions, may for a while be very successful in mischief: but it will all soon fall on their own head; and unless they be brought to deep repentance, they will be driven away as by a whirlwind, and their worst fears coming upon them, will sink them into final destruction and misery.—But the hope of the righteous is gladness. If the Lord see good, he can give them

NOTES.

CHAP. XI. V. 1. (Note, Deut. xxv. 13—16.) ‘Under this word, (balances) he condemneth all false weights, measures, and deceit.’—The strong language of Scripture, in many places, on this subject, demands the most serious consideration of all persons engaged in buying and selling. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 2. A proud conceit of a man’s own ability or excellency, accompanied with boastings and arrogant contempt of others, commonly makes way for his being put to shame, by having his ignorance and insufficiency detected and exposed.—‘When a man forgetteth himself, and thinketh to be exalted above his vocation, then God bringeth him to confusion.’—Indeed pride is always incompatible with true religion, and will surely end in everlasting shame and contempt. But true wisdom is attended with humility, which prepares the heart for the exercise of every christian temper, the practice of every duty, and the honourable performance of every useful undertaking.

V. 3. Strict integrity is commonly the best casuist. The upright Christian simply desires to know his duty, that he may do it. He is not bewildered by corrupt motives, or blinded by domineering passions. He has spiritual discernment and a tender conscience. So that in ordinary cases, his path is plain and obvious; and when he is at a loss, he depends on God, and looks to him for direction, and thus is preserved from fatal or distressing mistakes: but the crooked winding policy of ungodly men involves them in increasing wickedness, and terminates in their ruin. (Note, iii. 5, 6.)

V. 4. (Note, x. 2, 3.) The word rendered wrath denotes the most vehement indignation.—Seasons of temporal calamities are days of wrath; but the final judgment is emphatically “the day of wrath.” (Rom. ii. 5.)

V. 5, 6. The single aim and dependence of believers deliver them from those snares in which the wicked are taken: for the corrupt intentions and inordinate desires of bad men dispose them to catch at the baits, and thus to be caught in the traps which Satan lays for them.—‘Remember it, I say, (for it cannot be too often inculcated;) that the virtue of unfeignedly upright men shall be their preservative. But the wicked shall be entangled and inevitably perish in their own naughty contrivances; their lies, breach of promise, perjuries, and oppression.’ (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 7. Solomon would not have made this observation, had not the belief of a future state been fixed in his mind, and prevalent among his people: for as to this world’s prosperity, the hopes of the righteous perish equally with those of the wicked.—The last clause may be rendered, “yea, their strongest hope perisheth:” but the strongest hope of the righteous doth not then perish.” (xiv. 32.)

V. 8. The righteous are often wonderfully prevented from going into perilous situations, and ungodly men go in their stead: this seems to be chance, but is in effect the secret disposal of God’s providence. Indeed he frequently removes the righteous by death, before overwhelming judgments come upon wicked nations; and others succeed, and bear the calamity.

V. 9. ‘Wisdom instructs many, how to evade those snares, which the profane hypocrite, with counterfeit professions of friendship, lays to destroy his neighbours.’ (Bp. Patrick.)—It should, however, be further recollected, that hypocrites draw numbers aside from the religion of the Bible, and delude them into heresy and sin, to their destruction, by plausible professions and insinuations; by misrepresenting the nature of godliness, and slandering faithful teachers; by prejudicing men’s minds against the humiliating truths and holy precepts of God’s word, and persuading them that they may be saved in some easier and more pleasing way; or by giving them false impressions in these important concerns, from their conduct and conversation compared together. But the true Christian, by the knowledge of the sacred oracles, and his experience of their truth and excellency, is preserved from such fatal snares. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 10, 11. ‘Men of unbiased virtue make a city flourish, by the blessing they procure it from heaven, by their prayers, by their prudent advice, their pious admonitions, and their constant study of the public good. But the wicked, by their blasphemies, their evil counsels, their pestilent maxims, their impious doctrines, whereby they corrupt men’s manners, utterly subvert the good estate thereof.’ (Bp. Patrick.)—Men therefore should rejoice when the righteous are exalted to places of trust and power, and frequently great multitudes do: and they commonly triumph and exult, when notoriously unjust and oppressive counsellors or magistrates are cast down and punished for their crimes. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 12. A self-conceited man, being destitute of knowledge and experience, is disposed to express his contempt of others, and expose them to ridicule, when they make mistakes, or fall into trouble; and thus he exposes his own folly. But a man of understanding knows how to make proper allowances: he is aware of the instability of human affairs; he does not judge of men’s ability or integrity by their success; and if he sees anything reprehensible, he is reluctant to speak of it, or mentions it with caution and candour.

V. 13. A tale-bearer. The word signifies a trafficker in his neighbour’s fame and honour.—‘As a merchant carries about his goods for the sake of gain, so he carries about words, or rumours; if perhaps he may get advantage by them; but often from a certain levity and curiosity; it may be added, and from proud malevolence.—Scandalous intelligence, true or false, is the article in which the tale-bearer deals; he is a travelling pedlar, vending such wares; whatever therefore he discovers of this kind, he publishes, let who will be ruined or disgraced. But a man of fidelity conceals those secrets with which he is entrusted; and will not disclose what he knows by any means, when it may injure another’s peace or credit, except the honour of God and the good of society require it.

V. 14. When affairs, either public or private, are conducted with rashness, and directed by resentment or other corrupt passions, nothing but ruin can be expected. But when many wise and experienced men are consulted, and their counsel is deliberately and impartially considered, before a determination is taken, there is a reasonable prospect of safety and success.—‘They who have no government fall as leaves: but safety is found in much counsel.’ (Septuagint.)—A ship without a pilot is the figure employed; and the abundance of good counsel, rather than the number consulted, is stated as the ground of safety.

V. 15. (Note, vi. 1—5.) A stranger, ‘whose conversation he knoweth not.’—‘He doth not, without judgment and consideration of the circumstances, put himself in danger.’

V. 16. A pious and discreet woman is as careful of her chastity and reputation, as men are of their riches; and she will acquire and preserve the esteem and affection of her husband, and the respect of all around her, when old age has effaced her beauty; even as strong men keep possession of the wealth which they have once obtained.

V. 17. The compassionate, forgiving, and friendly man, in every sense best ensures his own comfort and happiness: whereas cruelty to others, in its very nature, as well as consequences, renders a man miserable; a torment to himself, as well as to his family and neighbours.

V. 18. They who attempt to deceive others deceive themselves, and are ruined by the very measures from which they expected the greatest advantage: but ‘patient continuance in well-doing,’ has a happy event, far more uniformly, than good husbandry and good seed secure a good crop of corn; for the faithfulness of God to his promises ensures the gracious reward.

18 The wicked worketh a deceitful work : but to him that soweth righteousness shall be a sure reward.

19 As righteousness tendeth to life : so he that pursueth evil pursueth it to his own death.

20 They that are of a froward heart are abomination to the LORD : but such as are upright in their way are his delight.

21 Though hand join in hand, the wicked shall not be unpunished : but the seed of the righteous shall be delivered.

22 As a jewel of gold in a swine's snout, so is a fair woman which is without discretion.

23 The desire of the righteous is only good : but the expectation of the wicked is wrath.

24 There is that scattereth, and yet increaseth ;

31 Behold, the righteous shall be recompensed in the earth : much more the wicked and the sinner.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1-14. The righteous God, who weigheth all our actions in an impartial balance, will never allow his subjects to defraud each other with impunity. It is, alas ! very common for men to give short weight and measure, and in various ways to cheat and rob their neighbours ; and numberless crimes of this kind here escape detection and punishment ; but let it not be overlooked, that they "are an abomination to the LORD ;" and that they will be produced at the day of judgment, as decisive proofs of the hypocrisy of multitudes, who have been zealous, in their way, for evangelical doctrines. This is so far from a light matter, that it is a most grievous oppression ; and thousands of the poor are sometimes deprived almost of necessary food, to enrich a few fraudulent dealers. But let it be remembered, that "he shall have judgment without mercy, who hath shewed no mercy : " on the other hand, he that is kept from growing rich, by conscientiously avoiding all exaction, and acting with strict honesty, may recollect that "a just weight is the LORD's delight." Indeed, "the integrity of the upright guides them" far from such fraudulent practices ; while the perverseness of transgressors destroys them, for "the wicked shall fall by their own wickedness," and be ensnared by Satan, through their own covetousness and selfishness.—But what are those wonderful advantages derived from riches, that men are universally so prone to seize the golden bait ? In times of public calamities, they generally expose the possessor to peculiar danger ; they will not profit in the day of wrath ; and he who trusteth in them, will certainly be left without resource in the hour of death and the day of judgment. How much more valuable then is that "righteousness which delivereth from death ! " How reasonable to "seek first the kingdom of God, and his righteousness ! "—Every one's conscience testifies, that "when a wicked man dieth, his expectation perisheth," and all his hopes expire in eternal despair ; and even the irreligious are constrained, when an eminently pious person is removed, to allow that he is delivered from trouble, and gone to a happier world. These salutary convictions might be more generally productive of abiding good ; did not "the hypocrite with his mouth destroy his neighbour," persuading the unstable to rest satisfied with a name, a notion, a form of godliness, an easy worldly religion.—May God grant to every reader that "knowledge, by which the just is delivered."—Indeed, the same conduct, which best secures our own happiness, is most conducive to the good of others : and if a truly wise and pious man be advanced to authority, many will eventually have great cause for rejoicing : whereas the prosperity of the wicked is a public calamity, and their downfall a most desirable event. Even in private, nay, in obscure situations, the righteous are both blessed and blessings ; by their example and prayers, public calamities are often prevented or retarded ; they are the light and the salt of the earth ; the fatal tendency of wicked counsellors, and impious opinions industriously circulated, are counteracted by their means. And who can say, to what extent such mischiefs would proceed, were all the righteous expelled from any country ?—They who are void of understanding despise their neighbours ; and go about as tale-bearers, slanderers, and betrayers of secrets, to the unspeakable mischief of society ; but the wise and righteous hold their peace, if they cannot speak to good purpose ; they scorn to betray such as confide in them, or even to injure them whose infirmities they witness, and they pity such as are not entitled to their esteem.—True religion, however, should be carefully distinguished from self-righteousness, for "when pride cometh, then cometh shame : but with the lowly is wisdom : " and also from all kinds of antinomian licentiousness. But, as in kingdoms "where no counsel is, the people perish," so it is in this respect : unless able and faithful ministers are raised up to instruct mankind, almost all run into one or the other of these fatal extremes. What need then is there for us to pray "the Lord of the harvest to send forth labourers into his harvest ! " for "in the multitude of these counsellors is safety ; " and what pains should all ministers take, that they may be wise and faithful counsellors in these important concerns. And how should all consult such as are approved for integrity and knowledge, especially in difficult cases, where their present comfort and usefulness, and eternal salvation, are deeply concerned !

V. 15-31. True religion is true wisdom : and while it prompts to all justice and mercy, it teaches men to avoid whatever is rash and pernicious. The wise and pious Christian will be very careful not to commit himself, by "becoming surety for a stranger," not only lest he should smart for it ; but lest his family and friends should be involved with him, and his ability to relieve the poor should be diminished. Unless, therefore, the case be peculiar, he will

V. 19. "Thus righteousness to life : and he that pursueth evil to death." The connection with the preceding verse, seems to be preserved.—It can hardly be supposed, that in all these contrasts between life and death, temporal prosperity or adversity is exclusively meant ; when the words, in other parts of the Scripture, denote eternal happiness or misery.

V. 20. (Notes, vi. 12-19. Marg. Ref.)

V. 21. "Though wicked men conspire, and join all their forces together ; yet all their combination and power shall not free them from just punishment." (Bp. Hall).—On the contrary, God is pleased to protect and bless the posterity of his faithful servants, in order to put honour on those who have honoured him.

V. 22. A costly ornament of gold in the snout of a swine, would be continually employed in raking in the filth and mire : thus beauty, in a woman void of prudence and virtue, is disgraced by subserving the basest and most ruinous crimes.

V. 23. The righteous only desire what is good in itself, and beneficial to others ; and this they may confidently hope to obtain : but the wicked, conscious of their selfish and vile motives and objects, can only expect the heavy wrath of God, and indeed are often "consumed with terrors."

V. 24, 25. "There are those, who, sowing their own, make it more ; and those who gather, and are impoverished." (Sept.). Liberality, exercised from right motives, is sowing seed, and God gives the increase generally, even in temporal things ; but he that withholds, when a just and right occasion offers, "that is, the niggard," seldom prospers much even in this world. For God metes to men in their own measure ; and bad crops, bad debts, expensive sickness, and a variety of similar deductions, soon amount to more than liberal alms would have done ; while, if God see it best, large increase, flourishing trade, kind friends, and various other supplies or savings, soon reimburse the expenses of genuine charity.

V. 26. "He that hoardeth corn in a time of scarcity, on purpose to raise the price, shall fall into the popular hatred, and have many a curse." (Bp. Patrick.)—In such distressing seasons, there are individuals who refuse to sell, nay, who hoard up provisions, in a cruel hope of enhancing the prices still more ; but they not only incur the public odium, (in which great multitudes of innocent characters are commonly involved ; ) but are very generally losers by their avarice, as well as exposed to the wrath of God. Whereas he who sells at a moderate price, is commended by those who are relieved, and best consults his own benefit as well as the public good.—The original word, however, at least equally includes those that give, or break, their bread to the hungry ; who certainly are more generally blessed and prayed for.

V. 27. The word rendered diligently signifies the morning. "He that from the time he rises, studies nothing but how to do good, shall obtain favour both of God and man : but he whose business is to do mischief, shall draw upon himself the evil he designs against others." (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 28. "He whose confidence in riches makes him unjust, and unmerciful, shall fall into decay ; but they whose pious dependence on God makes them just and charitable, like a flourishing tree, shall thrive and prosper." (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 29. Many, by their furious passions and contentiousness, or by their pride and prodigality, avarice and other vices, become a plague and vexation to their families ; but they can expect nothing save disappointment and trouble for their own portion ; and in general, they, who are destitute of prudence or industry, will soon become servants to those who are more diligent and discreet.

V. 30. The good example, pious discourse, wise instructions, fervent prayers, and zealous good works of the righteous, become exceedingly beneficial to those around them ; they are as fruit from the tree of life ; they promote the salvation of sinful men. And as immortal souls are valuable beyond all estimation, he who thus wins souls, and allures them into the way of eternal life, is emphatically the wise man ; he proposes to himself the noblest end, he uses the only proper means, he perseveres, and is prospered by God himself.

V. 31. Even the righteous, when they offend, shall be recompensed on earth with sharp corrections ; much more then will the wicked, who dare the vengeance of heaven, meet at length with the due reward of their impiety and iniquity.—It is remarkable that St. Peter has quoted the Septuagint translation of this verse. "If the righteous scarcely be saved, where shall the ungodly and sinner appear ? "

CHAP. XII.

Maxims of wisdom distinguishing the righteous from the wicked, by their thoughts, words, and works; noting the different event of their conduct; and teaching discretion both in temporal and spiritual things, 1-28.

WHOSO loveth instruction loveth knowledge: but he that hateth reproof is brutish.

2 A good man obtaineth favour of the LORD: but a man of wicked devices will he condemn.

3 A man shall not be established by wickedness: but the root of the righteous shall not be moved.

5 The thoughts of the righteous are right: but the counsels of the wicked are deceit.

6 The words of the wicked are to lie in wait for blood: but the mouth of the upright shall deliver them.

7 The wicked are overthrown, and are not; but the house of the righteous shall stand.

8 A man shall be commended according to his wisdom: but he that is of a perverse heart shall be despised.

stand aloof, knowing that "he who hateth suretyship is sure." At the same time, he will endeavour in this world of sin and misery to do what he can towards the relief of distress and the communication of happiness. Indeed, this is one of the most pleasant of human enjoyments. While the selfish and sordid, the envious and malicious, the sensual, profligate, and dissipated, are tortured, in various ways, by their own passions, and by the effects of them, and trouble their families by their misconduct; "the merciful man doeth good to his own soul." He doubles his own enjoyments, secures a blessing on his undertaking and possessions, has inward peace and confidence, and the satisfaction of knowing that many are blessing him and praying for him.—By diligently seeking the good of others, he procures favour from man, and obtains assurance of the Lord's merciful acceptance.—"He soweth righteousness, and his reward is sure." Even if he be poor, his "desire is only good," and his prayers and example will be useful. According to the degree, in which God has prospered him, he waters others, and shall himself be abundantly watered: and experience proves, that they, who on christian principles abound in liberality, even beyond what rigid prudence would allow, so far from impoverishing their families, are generally prospered in a remarkable manner.—On the other hand, they, who profess to "know the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ," and learn, by hints at least, from various quarters, that they are thought to "withhold more than is meet," and plead that they cannot afford to be charitable, should consider whether God does not withhold his blessing from their temporal concerns, on this very ground; and whether they ought not to prove him by adopting a more liberal plan.—Indeed, almost in every thing, that is best for us, which is best for our neighbours; in giving, lending, selling, or the contrary, covetousness commonly defeats its own ends; and he who grasps at unfair advantages, comes short of such as he might conscientiously and creditably have secured. This indeed is one effect of human selfishness, and exposes its folly: yet it still continues to influence the conduct of almost all men, and often, in circumstances of such cruelty, as are shocking to relate, and amidst general execration.—The common excuse indeed, for covetousness, is regard to a man's family: yet this should, in fact, teach a contrary lesson; for "the seed of the righteous shall be delivered" from those evils, which overwhelm the posterity of the wicked.—So that the most prosperous sinner, in every sense, "worketh a deceitful work;" he "pursueth evil to his own death;" and as "they who are of a froward heart are an abomination to the Lord;" it must certainly follow, that "though hand join in hand, the wicked shall not be unpunished." For if "the righteous be recompensed in the earth," if God sharply corrects his children, in whom he delighteth, what will be the doom of his determined enemies?—Alas! vast numbers throng the broad road to destruction; and keep one another in countenance and in spirits, notwithstanding the awful warnings given them in the sacred Scriptures: while the narrow way to life is still but little frequented.—But they who have found the way of life should be unwearied in their endeavours to win over others, to accompany them to it. They should study to recommend the gospel by a harmless and kind, as well as pious, behaviour; and by a constant attention to all the proprieties of relative life: and they ought to use every means, consistent with their station in society, to make their connections and neighbours wise unto salvation. As one soul is more valuable than the whole world; and as successful endeavours for the conversion of sinners is a peculiar evidence of true wisdom: so no disappointments or unmerited reproaches should prevent the Christian's persevering in his benevolent and zealous efforts; for if at length he prevails but in one instance, this will amply make amends for all his past discouragements. In this view how good is the work of the ministry! How honourable and useful the diligent and faithful minister! What encouragement is there for all, employed in this sacred service, to labour incessantly, even amidst contempt and hardship! Here especially "the fruit of the righteous is a tree of life;" and it will soon appear, that "they who win souls" are far wiser, than they who heap up wealth: for he who "trusteth in his riches shall fall; but the righteous shall flourish as a branch."—Indeed, we cannot turn any way without seeing the excellency of the righteous: it may be useful to many readers, to compare the prudent and pious matron, who retains her reputation, and grows into the affections of those related to her, and increases respect, when external accomplishments are wearing out; who often wins to the paths of holiness the souls of her children, or servants, and perhaps even that of her husband; with the fair woman that wants discretion, whose beauty only serves to render her more conspicuously infamous and mischievous. Let the young then contemplate this contrast; and seek wisdom and grace, as the only enduring embellishments, and recommendations to constancy of affection and esteem. Finally, let us all desire and pursue those blessings, which our Surety purchased for sinners by his sufferings and death; and study to imitate his instructions, to copy his example, and to keep his commandments.

NOTES.

CHAP. XII. V. 1. Brutish. (Note, Ps. xcii. 6.)

V. 2. A good, &c. That is, a man of a kind, friendly, and merciful disposition. Where this is genuine and habitual, and pervades a man's whole conduct, without allowed exceptions of persons or cases, it must be the effect of divine grace: and such a person will be proportionably favoured by the Lord, both with inward peace, and a blessing on his undertakings. But he who allows himself to devise wickedness, waiting for an opportunity of committing it; or who covers selfish and vicious designs under a profession of religion, friendship, or affection, will be condemned by the righteous Judge of the world.

V. 3. The prosperity, which is obtained by wickedness, cannot be permanently established, by any sagacity or power: but the righteous resemble trees that strike deep root in the earth, and grow up gradually: the branches of which may be shaken by furious tempests, but they are secured by the root from material detriment.—"They are so grounded in the favour of God, that their root shall prosper continually." (Marg. Ref.)

V. 4. A prudent and faithful woman, who has strength of mind to govern her passions, and who diligently attends to domestic affairs, will prove a great comfort to her husband, and conduce more to his credit than the wearing of a crown could do. But a contentious, imperious, extravagant, improvident, or adulterous woman, is like a disease which wastes the bones. She will injure his character, ruin his circumstances, prevent the proper care of his family, lead him into temptation, drive him into bad company and excess, or perhaps shorten his days by the inward anguish that she occasions.

V. 5. (Note, Psalm, cxix. 113.) The righteous habitually devise, contrive, and purpose those things that are good and just; they desire to know and to do the will of God, and have no sinister or malicious intentions covered over with fair professions.—But the wicked secretly contrive how to compass their interested purposes, and to avoid detection and disgrace on account of their concealed iniquities; they consult with themselves how to over-reach, and obtain undue advantages in bargains; and they would commit more fraud, injustice, or other wickedness, if they were not afraid of hurting their reputations, or of falling under the lash of human laws.

V. 6. Wicked men frequently consult together concerning the most effectual means of gratifying their avarice, ambition, revenge, lust, or enmity against the servants of God; and they are ready to lie in wait for blood, when they can do it with impunity. Hence unrighteous wars, massacres, assassinations, oppressions, persecutions, and murders of various kinds, have prevailed in the world, ever since Cain lay in wait for the blood of righteous Abel: and far more innocent blood would be shed, were the restraint of human laws removed. But the mouth of the upright, pleading their own cause with wisdom that cannot be gainsayed, often delivers them from false accusers and persecutors: and they frequently give such information, cautions, and counsels to those, who are laid in wait for, as deliver them also from the danger.

V. 7. When ungodly men have attained the summit of prosperity, through the fickleness of their patrons, or of the multitude and envy of rivals; through the instability of human affairs, the failure of their projects, or the detection of their wickedness; or, through their insolence, cruelty, and rashness, they are often overthrown at once, their families and party are ruined with them, and they are gone and neglected in a very short time. (Notes, &c. Est. vi. vii.) But the moderate prosperity of the righteous stands on a firmer basis, and, by the blessing of God, is often continued to their descendants.

V. 8. Whatever transient reputation a man may acquire for his external or superficial accomplishments, or even for abilities, learning, and achievements, if he be of a perverse disposition, and go on in the crooked ways of iniquity and impiety, he will at length sink into contempt. But the man of true wisdom and piety, though for a time neglected, will at length assuredly be approved, commended, and had in honour. The first clause is literally, "according to the mouth of his wisdom, a man shall be praised;" and the capacity of giving wise counsel, in an agreeable and impressive manner, seems especially intended.

V. 9. Many persons who have been brought up in the higher ranks of life, but have not proportionable wealth, are too proud to employ themselves in inferior occupations; and thus they become miserably poor, want things necessary for themselves and families, sponge upon their friends, and even defraud their creditors, to maintain a vain appearance of dignity. But he who is despised for engaging in a mean employment, and wearing a homely appearance, but by so doing can have the comforts of life without dependence or disingenuous arts, is more happy, wise, useful, and respectable, than "he that honoureth himself, and lacketh bread."—The old translation (with which many versions agree) gives a different sense to this proverb. "He that is despised, and is his own servant, is better than he that boasteth himself, and wanteth bread." The poor man, who is despised, yet lives by his honest labour, is more valuable and happy than the proud boaster.

V. 10. A pious man is always compassionate, and would deem it cruelty to put even an animal to needless pain, or to abuse those useful creatures which conduce so much to the comfort of life. But wicked men are hard-hearted and cruel, even in their tenderest mercies. Thus they deem themselves very merciful, 9 He that is 'despised, and hath a servant, is better than he that honoureth himself, and lacketh bread.

10 A 'righteous man regardeth the life of his beast: 'but the 'tender mercies of the wicked are cruel.

11 He that 'tilleth his land shall be satisfied with bread: but 'he that followeth vain persons is 'void of understanding.

12 The wicked 'desireth the 'net of evil men: but 'the root of the righteous yieldeth fruit.

13 The 'wicked is 'snared by the transgression of his lips: 'but the just shall come out of trouble.

14 A man shall be 'satisfied with good by the fruit of his mouth: 'and the recompense of a man's hands shall be rendered unto him.

15 The 'way of a fool is right in his own eyes: 'but he that hearkeneth unto counsel is wise.

16 A 'fool's wrath is 'presently known: 'but a prudent man covereth shame.

17 He 'that speaketh truth sheweth forth righteousness: 'but a false witness deceit.

when their oppressions are not quite so cruel as they might be, and they often affect to speak of the poor and distressed as being very well used, and in a very desirable situation, when they themselves could not endure such treatment for a single day. (Marg. Ref.)—It is very laudable to exercise kindness towards brute creatures, that we keep ourselves the more remote from all manner of cruelty towards men. (Gratius.)

V. 12. When the ungodly see others prosper by iniquity, they straightway wish that they could act with similar ingenuity, or obtain the same opportunities; they would be glad of the advantages of sin, forgetting or despising its guilt and after-reckoning; and they are not so great plunderers or cheats as some are, merely because they cannot or dare not. But the root of divine grace, in the heart of the righteous, produceth good desires and purposes, and yieldeth more comfort to themselves, besides doing much good to others.—'The wicked man affects those methods of fraudulent invention, which he sees some fraudulent oppressors use to their advantage.' (Bp. Hall.)

V. 13. Perjuries, treasonable words, defamations, and lies, often involve wicked men, however subtle, in most perplexing troubles, and they are snared by the transgression of their own lips; while a frank and open conduct eventually tends to credit and comfort.

V. 14. When a man speaks that which is useful to others, he receives satisfaction from it himself; by counselling and instructing others, he edifies himself, and God will graciously recompense the good words and works of his servants, as well as punish the wicked according to their deserts.

V. 15. A fool is so conceited and headstrong, that he is incapable of taking warning or counsel; and he is determined to vindicate all he does, and to persist in all his rash enterprizes, as if he were infallible. But a wise man distrusts his own judgment and heart; he is afraid of being misled, and desires to be convinced of his errors and misconduct; and so he hearkens to instruction, that he may grow wiser and wiser.

V. 16. A foolish man is soon made angry, and is hasty in expressing his resentment, without regard to company or circumstances; and thus he is ever embroiled in quarrels, and running into mischief. But a prudent man carefully stifles his resentment, and avoids such words and actions, as would afterwards cover him with shame; or he covers the shameful behaviour of such as abuse him, and lets it pass unnoticed.—The old translation is more literal, 'a fool in a day shall be known by his anger,' &c. The word rendered prudent, commonly means cunning; and so may point out the shrewd crafty man, who seems to take no notice of affronts, because he designs hereafter either to revenge them, or to turn them in some way to his own advantage.

V. 17. He who in a court of justice unreservedly testifies to the whole truth, subverts the cause of equity, and assists the magistrate in decreeing righteous judgment; but false witnesses impose on him, and may thus lead him unintentionally to decide in favour of the wicked.—The maxim holds equally good, in many other cases, when a full and fair declaration of the truth effectually subverts the cause of justice and piety.

V. 18, 19. False accusations and perjuries may murder like a sword, or rob a man of his estate; and calumnies may wound his credit, or excite suspicions and contentions destructive of domestic comfort, and of the peace of his mind. But the tongue of the wise is employed in composing differences, in vindicating aspersed characters, in comforting the distressed, and in promoting justice, piety, and charity. And he who thus makes truth his standard, and equity and peace his aim, will gradually establish his own character, and will not have cause to fear any investigation; but lies and deceit only serve a present purpose, expose a man to speedy detection, and render him suspected and distrusted in every thing.

V. 20. They who imagine evil, dare not openly avow their designs; so that malice and mischief are always attended with dissimulation, and productive of terrors and perplexities; but such as consult the peace and happiness of others have joy and serenity in their own minds.

V. 21. This verse may be rendered "The just shall not be given up to any iniquity; but the wicked are full of mischief."—The Septuagint renders the last clause 'nothing iniquitous shall please.'

V. 22. (Note, vi. 16-19.)

V. 23. Men of prudence and discretion make no ostentation of their knowledge; but reserve it for suitable occasions, and shew it in their conduct; but ignorant and frivolous persons are generally vain-glorious, and by attempting to display their wit or learning, they commonly proclaim their own emptiness and folly.

V. 24. Diligence has a natural tendency to advance men in society, and will generally conduct them to eminence in their occupations, or to influence or authority in the community; but the slothful are never likely to be anything but dependents or slaves. The word rendered slothful, may mean deceitful, and indeed sloth is commonly an inlet to dishonesty, which exposes a man to penalties, confinement, and severe treatment. (Note, x. 4.)

V. 25. Distress of conscience, sharp afflictions, and discouraging fears, deject the heart, and unfit a man for his duty; but a kind and encouraging word may often give a favourable turn to his thoughts, inspire him with hope, and animate him to activity; this maxim points out an easy and cheap way of being useful.

V. 26. Though wicked men cannot but see that the righteous are more excellent than their neighbours, and in general more abound in comforts, yet the pleasures and gains of their iniquities seduce their minds, and cause them to continue in their disgraceful, perilous, and wretched courses.

V. 27. The slothful (or deceitful) man makes no good use of the advantages that providence throws in his way, and has no comfort of them; if at any time he make a vigorous exertion, or seem successful, he loses all the benefit for want of perseverance, and so he brings nothing to perfection. But the possessions of a diligent man are valuable to himself, and to others also.

V. 28. What is the meaning of this verse, if Solomon confined his views, as some would persuade us, to this mortal life and dying world?

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1-14. The degree of our love to any object may fairly be measured by our value for the means of obtaining it. He who loves science loves study, and prizes information. He who chooses wisdom and grace, values the word and ordinances of God, and is thankful even for reproofs, which conduce to his improvement. On the other hand, the man whose main object it is to gratify his appetites and passions, cannot but despise instruction and hate reproof; and consequently he chooses to reside in places, and frequent companies, where he is least likely to meet with any check in his evil courses. The Lord seeth, and will at length discover to the whole world, the secret thoughts of every heart. Then the contrivances, speculations, and desires of those who devise evil will be condemned, though they have never been reduced to practice; and the benevolent intentions, the pious meditations, the plans and counsels of the righteous to do good, though here frustrated, will be made known, and graciously rewarded. And when the concealed part of every character shall be made public and manifest, the difference between the righteous and the wicked will appear so evident and immense, that none shall have one word to speak against the sentence awarded to each of them. Let us for a moment realize the idea of every word that men have spoken, during their whole lives, being called over at the day of judgment. What a discovery will thus be made of men's hearts! Not to dwell on the vain and corrupt communication which proceeds out of the mouths of the ungodly; all the secret cabals of those who lie in wait for blood, all the perjuries and calumnies by which men accomplish their cruel or unrighteous purposes; all their lies, flatteries, reproaches, proud boastings, and blasphemies, when made known before the assembled world, will form such a discovery, as must overwhelm the wicked with unutterable confusion. On the other hand, the pious discourse and wise counsels of the righteous, by which they rescued many from snares and dangers, or endeavoured to be useful to their souls, and every good and profitable word which they have spoken, will be made known to their joy, and contribute to evince their real character. Thus they shall be satisfied with good by the fruit of their lips, as well as recompensed according to the work of their hands. Even those men of the world who are the wisest in their generation, are unable to establish themselves by their wickedness; and frequently they and their families fall and perish, as rapidly as they at first prospered. But the righteous, being rooted in the favour of God, and secured by his promises, shall never be moved; they are fruitful and useful, and the generation of the upright shall be blessed. Many of them indeed are poor in this world, and earn their bread by hard labour; but having food and raiment, they are content and satisfied. They think no honest labour a disgrace, and while the proud and slothful, and such as follow after vain persons, affect the appearance of affluence, honour themselves and despise the industrious, often sink into deep distress; the very persons they slight, possess very many comforts, and also find something to spare to relieve the indigent. Again, who are they that enjoy most comfort, and prove the greatest blessings in domestic life? Mark the difference between the pious and prudent woman, who is a crown to her husband, and her that maketh ashamed, and is as rottenness in his bones! Can any one seriously consider this subject, and endure the thought of ever becoming the disgrace, misery, and ruin of the nearest relation on earth? Yet vice and folly commonly produce this dreadful consequence; and there is no security against it, or reasonable hope of becoming creditable, comfortable, and useful, in any relation of life, without piety and heavenly wisdom. How then are they deluded, who, in forming the conjugal union, prefer beauty, wit, or external accomplishments, to substantial excellency of character!—Indeed, the real and consistent Christian not only endeavours to make his relations, domestics, and neighbours comfortable; but he sympathizes in the sufferings of the very animals; is incapable of cruelty to them, will not allow others to abuse them, and takes pleasure in seeing them enjoy that kind of happiness of which they are capable. Surely then, he will never desire the net of evil men; but rather at any time renounce his own indulgence and interest, than add to the miseries of human beings in any part of the globe. But the tender mercies of the wicked are cruel. They lavish outward favours, while they would seduce the objects of their selfish affection to those crimes which are most ruinous in this world and the next. They are prodigal to the worthless, and harsh to the industrious. They exact by merciless oppression from one set of men, what they bestow on another with ostentatious liberality. They weep over the tragic tale of imaginary woe, and are callous to real misery. They affect the praise of philanthropy, by a specious conduct abroad; while their harsh spirit and furious passions render their own families a scene of confusion and misery!—It is indeed most wonderful, how generally these truths, or rather facts, are overlooked or forgotten; and how little effect they produce on the judgment and conduct even of professed Christians! But at length, “a man shall certainly be commended according to his wisdom,” “the righteous shall come out of trouble,” “and he that is of a perverse spirit shall be despised.”

V. 15-28. In proportion as men are foolish, they commonly are self-sufficient. “Their way,” however rash and absurd in itself, “is right in their own eyes:” and instead of growing wiser by hearkening to prudent counsel; they consider every intimation that they are mistaken as an almost unpardonable affront.—The first appearance of this spirit should be carefully checked, in young people especially; for when it has got the ascendancy, there is little hope of repressing it. (Note, ix. 7. 8.)—When persons of this character take offence, their wrath is presently known, by passionate language, upbraidings, and slanders, if not by furious endeavours to revenge themselves. They “speak like the piercing of a sword;” not caring whose character, interest, or comfort they wound or destroy; but in thus pouring out of the abundance of their hearts, they proclaim their own foolishness, and will soon be filled with mischief. “Lying lips are abomination to the Lord, but they that deal truly are his delight.” Among the several ways in which this maxim may be improved to practical purposes, it peculiarly applies to the ministers of religion. “He, who in this respect speaketh truth, sheweth forth righteousness; but a false witness deceit.” And that minister, who “shuns not to declare the whole counsel of God,” and “keeps back nothing profitable;” who never wounds but in order to heal; who injures no man's credit or peace, as with the piercings of the sword of an enemy; but often lays open the conscience with the faithful wounds of a friendly surgeon, to prepare the way for heavenly consolations; this man, I say, however despised and hated at present, will at length “receive the crown of glory which fadeth not away.” In this case especially, “the lip of truth shall be established for ever; but the lying tongue is but for a moment.” Even the silence of a pious man, while he represses resentment, meekly endures provocation, hides the shame that folly would expose; conceals the knowledge which ostentation would display, or frowns silent disapprobation where a more direct reproof would be improper, is an evidence of wisdom, and full of instruction. In short, in every thing, “the righteous is more excellent than his neighbour,” and far more happy also.—While “deceit in the heart of those who imagine evil” often fills them with alarm and anguish, to the counsellors of peace is joy; and when the good words or kind actions which they speak make glad the hearts of the afflicted or desponding, they share the comfort which they communicate. The diligence, modesty, prudence, and integrity, which true religion teaches, procure men influence and respect, frequently among such as are themselves irreligious; and so advance them to desirable and useful situations; while sloth, prodigality, and duplicity, tend directly to abject dependence, deep distress, or general contempt, even in this world. These things indeed are undeniable; and many ungodly men have transient convictions, nay, sometimes an abiding opinion, that their pious neighbours or relations are and will be happier than themselves; but they are seduced by evil companions and indulged passions, and they remain the slaves of sin.—Their temporary efforts at reformation, with all their knowledge and advantages, prove unavailing, for want of resolution and perseverance; they either adopt false principles, and so are hardened in presumption; or, being baffled in their feeble and heartless endeavours, they lie down in despondence.—Oh then, let every reader hear the Saviour's call, “and strive to enter in at the strait gate; for many, I say unto you, will seek to enter in, and not be able.”—But happy indeed are they, who are walking in the way of “righteousness:” for in it is life, and in “the pathway thereof there is no death.” Generally, when the wicked take a hasty resolution, or make a vigorous effort, they lose all the benefit, for want of persevering diligence and dependence on the Lord; so that whilst the diligent acquire dominion over their passions, the slothful is under tribute to his lusts. Every advantage is precious to the former, but useless or ruinous to the latter; and he is always either buoyed up in presumption, or sunk down into despondency. In short, all the knowledge and convictions of the ungodly settle in something short of a holy life; but the prudent Christian makes no ostentation of his knowledge, except in his exemplary conduct and useful conversation, and in encouraging the dejected to hope in and wait upon the Lord.

NOTES.

CHAP. XIII. V. 1. A young man of prudence and good sense will pay attention to his father's good instruction, and not require reproofs or corrections, to induce his obedience: on the contrary, a scorner will not hear, obey, or be influenced by even the severest rebukes.

V. 2. “A man shall eat good things by the fruit of his mouth; but the soul of the trespassers shall suffer violence.” (Old Translation.)—“If he use his tongue to the glory of God and the good of his neighbour, God shall bless him.”

V. 3. “He that looks carefully to his tongue, takes a safe course for preserving his life, which is often endangered by much and wild talking.” (Bp. Hall.)

V. 4. Sluggard, &c. “He ever desireth, but taketh no pains to get any thing.” This applies both to things temporal and things eternal. God gives every thing, but in a way of diligence. He works in us to will and do: but, in all things, his order has connected industry and prosperity, sloth and misery.

V. 5. A pious man abhors deceit and lies, as detestable in themselves; and he has no occasion for such base means; because he has no bad ends to accomplish: but the wicked endeavour to impose on their neighbours, to conceal their crimes, and to gratify their passions by deceit; till at length they render themselves generally contemptible and odious.

V. 6. (Notes, xi. 3. 5. 6.) “Wicked contrivances are overthrown by their own iniquity.” (marg.) (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 7. Many persons make a shew of wealth, and live at a great expense, and engage in large concerns, who are indeed possessed of little or no property; and thus they become public cheats. Others, who are very rich, pretend to be, and live as if they were, poor; and thus they bereave themselves and their families of good, and refuse to improve the talents committed to their stewardship. Pharisees and hypocrites also make a shew of that piety which they have not, and so impose on others and deceive themselves; while some true Christians are always discouraging themselves by groundless fears; and in many instances men impose on multitudes, by pretending to skill which they have not; whereas others through excessive or affected modesty obstruct their own usefulness.

V. 8. Riches often tempt men to rob, or to raise prosecutions against, those who possess them: and then, if they can ransom their lives by parting with their treasures, they think themselves well off. But the poor man is exempt from such rebukes, perils, and terrors; for no one thinks it worth while to lodge an accusation against him, for such purposes; and he commonly escapes best 9 The light of the righteous rejoiceth: but the lamp of the wicked shall be put out.

10 Only by pride cometh contention: but with the well-advised is wisdom.

11 Wealth gotten by vanity shall be diminished: but he that gathereth by labour shall increase.

12 Hope deferred maketh the heart sick: but when the desire cometh, it is a tree of life.

13 Whoso despiseth the word shall be destroyed: but he that feareth the commandment shall be rewarded.

14 The law of the wise is a fountain of life, to depart from the snares of death.

15 Good understanding giveth favour: but the way of transgressors is hard.

16 Every prudent man dealeth with knowledge: but a fool layeth open his folly.

17 A wicked messenger falleth into mischief: but a faithful ambassador is health.

18 Poverty and shame shall be to him that refuseth instruction: but he that regardeth reproof shall be honoured.

19 The desire accomplished is sweet to the soul: but it is abomination to fools to depart from evil.

20 He that walketh with wise men shall be wise: but a companion of fools shall be destroyed.

21 Evil pursueth sinners: but to the righteous good shall be repayed.

22 A good man leaveth an inheritance to his children's children: and the wealth of the sinner is laid up for the just.

23 Much food is in the tillage of the poor; but there is that is destroyed for want of judgment.

24 He that spareth his rod hateth his son: but he that loveth him chasteneth him betimes.

25 The righteous eateth to the satisfying of his soul: but the belly of the wicked shall want.

in public calamities. Some indeed take the sentence quite otherwise.—“A rich man, when he fears any evil from his enemies, can divert it by a sum of money; but a poor man when he is threatened, dare not stay, but runs away.” (Bp. Horne.) “The poor cannot bear the reproach; for by his poverty he is not able to escape the threatenings, which the cruel oppressors use against him.” The latter clause is taken in an unfavourable sense in the first verse; but in other respects the first interpretation seems best grounded.

V. 9. “The happiness of the just is great and illustrious, like the light of the sun; and increases still, to their endless joy,” &c. (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 10. “Only by pride will a man engage in contention,” &c. The various quarrels which disquiet the world, whether in families, churches, or communities, or between nations, with all the fatal consequences of them, are in general excited and perpetuated by pride. From that odious principle arise resentment, revenge, envy, and ambition: and though other vicious dispositions excite contentions; yet disputes would more easily be prevented or terminated, if pride did not intervene. Some point of honour must be maintained, some affront must be resented, some rival must be crushed or eclipsed, some renowned character emulated, or some superior equalled and surpassed. But they who hear prudent counsel, will shew their wisdom, by avoiding quarrels and disputes. “They whose minds are infected with a vain opinion of themselves, either cannot see the truth; or if they do, they will not acknowledge it, for fear they should yield and confess themselves overcome.” (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 11. Wealth acquired by dishonest practices, such as gaming, cheating, oppression, or subserving the vices and follies of men, is attended with a secret curse which speedily wastes it: and this all sagacious observers of mankind have remarked. But that, which is gotten by honest labour, is attended by a blessing, and is likely to endure and increase.

V. 12. When any thing earnestly desired, is long delayed, the mind is fatigued with waiting, the soul becomes feeble and diseased, and often the body shares the malady: but when the desired object is attained, it gives peculiar delight. The expression, “a tree of life,” seems to imply that spiritual blessings are especially meant; which are never earnestly sought in vain, and never disappoint the expectation of those who long and wait for them.

V. 13. “Meaning the word of God, whereby he is admonished of his duty.”—“He who despises and hates divine truth, shall be given up to a strong delusion: but peace shall be conferred on him that reverences the command of God.”

V. 14. The rule by which the wise man regulates his own conduct, and the injunctions that he prescribes to others, are “his laws.” In both senses they are a fountain yielding life and happiness, and a guide directing men at a distance from the snares of death.

V. 15. “Good insight into businesses, and discreet carriage in them, procureth thankful acceptance; but those that take wrong courses cause much trouble and vexation.” (Bp. Hall.)—“Ungodly men expect to tread a smooth and pleasant path: but their vices have such consequences on their constitutions, circumstances, and reputations, as render their road very rugged and painful: and their misery is increased by stings of conscience, and by the dread of death and judgment.”

V. 16. “Every wise man will work by knowledge: but a fool will spread abroad folly.” (Old Translation.)—“Wise men deliberate before they act, and conduct their concerns with skill and judgment: but a foolish man exposes himself, by his rash undertakings and imprudent management.”

V. 17. A wicked messenger who betrays his trust, or a faithless ambassador who sells the interests of his prince and country, do not more certainly injure others, than expose themselves to infamy and ruin. But the faithful messenger or ambassador gives satisfaction, is useful, and will be honoured and rewarded.—This is emphatically applicable to the ambassadors, whom the Lord sends with his message to sinners.

V. 18. (Note, 1.) The Septuagint renders the first clause; “Education taketh away poverty and disgrace.”—The best method of preserving our children from poverty and shame, is to educate them well.

V. 19. The pleasure and satisfaction, arising from the attainment of a desired object, abundantly compensate for the trouble and self-denial of pursuing it. This especially holds good, in respect of the comforts of true religion. But fools, or ungodly men, have so strong and rooted a dislike to repentance, reformation, and religious duties; that they cannot be induced to take the proper method of obtaining these comforts, or even of escaping the wrath to come.

V. 20. It is a hopeful indication of prudence and piety, when wise and good companions are habitually preferred: and by continual intercourse with them, good principles are strengthened, good habits formed, and wisdom matured. But he that chooses bad company proves his folly, and is in the way of learning and practising more and more all those evils that lead to ruin temporal and eternal.

V. 21. (Marg. Ref.) The sinner may long escape: but evil pursues him, and will at length surely overtake him; as the hounds steadily follow, and, after many windings, seize on their prey.

V. 22. The liberal servant of God, whilst he shakes his hands from iniquitous gain, and is not solicitous about riches, and even disperses in charity as if about to impoverish his family, takes the best method of providing for his posterity: for the wealth, which wicked men get by crimes, with great labour and inquietude, is laid up for the righteous and their families: and by the secret disposal of providence shall come into their possession, when they have occasion for it.

V. 23. The poor and industrious, who labour to cultivate a little spot of land, often live in a plentiful though homely manner: whilst they, who have inherited large estates, are reduced to poverty by negligence, indiscretion, ostentation, and extravagance. In this way the wealth of the covetous hoarder is often in the next generation transferred to the good man's family.

V. 24. The perverseness of our fallen nature renders correction necessary to children. He, therefore, who indulges his son, connives at his perverseness, suffers him to contract vicious habits, and to grow stubborn in rebellion, for want of correction; acts as if he hated him: because he permits those diseases of the mind to gather strength, which will prove the sources of inexpressible sorrow to him in this world, and perhaps of eternal misery. Whereas the parent, who wisely loves his child, will early begin to teach him submission, application, and the government of his passions: and having thus bent the tender twig, and established his authority, he will gradually be enabled to rule him more by persuasion and argument, and to treat with the lenity of a kind and prudent friend. But when children are permitted to get the mastery in their tender years, they can scarcely ever after be taught subjection, and the attempt is often made by a severity which is both perilous and painful.—The word rendered chasteneth is often translated instruction, (18.) “He that spareth his rod hateth his son; but he that loveth him, diligently educates or disciplines him.” (Septuagint.) The same term being used, in the original both of the Old and New Testament, for tuition and correction, strongly indicates the close connection between them, in a scripturally good education. (Com. Eph. vi. 4, with Heb. xii. 5—11. Greek.)

V. 25. The servants of God are satisfied with their temporal provisions though mean or scanty, and use them with cheerfulness and thankfulness. But the wicked are never satisfied, have no enjoyment of their possessions, and will sink at last into final and eternal want and misery.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—12. Teachable and dutiful children commonly, if spared, become wise, useful, and prosperous men: but such as scorn reproof, and harden themselves under rebukes and corrections, are likely to be miserable themselves, and causes of misery to others.—He, who speaketh “that which is good, to

And can we imagine, that these maxims of heavenly wisdom relate only to the affairs of this transient world? Can we doubt, whether the difference between the indolent and the diligent, in spiritual concerns, will or will not be at least equally manifest, both here and hereafter?—The hateful nature likewise of lies and duplicity is shewn, in Scripture, in every way most suited to convince and affect us. God hates lies, and the righteous hate lies: for every man of genuine piety abhors and loves what his Lord abhors and loves. Let then such, as allow themselves to belie in their professions, of whatever kind, the secret purposes and thoughts of their hearts, look well to themselves: and if they pretend to religion, let them tremble, lest at last they should have their portion with the hypocrites. They may, at present, deceive others and even themselves: but when the whole shall be laid open, (and the awful day approaches,) they will appear loathsome, and be overwhelmed with confusion.—It does not indeed consist with christian simplicity, for a man to assume the appearance of wealth, knowledge, or skill in any profession, which he does not possess; or even to deny, under an affectation of modesty, the talents which he ought to improve, to the benefit of his brethren and the honour of God.—But righteousness preserveth the upright in the middle path; and an honest desire to do the Lord's will secures a man from important mistakes, and from that wickedness which overthroweth the sinner, far better than the most exact casuistical decisions.—In all things, the knowledge, grace, and success of the righteous, are a source of increasing joy, which will be perfected in heavenly felicity; but the lamp of the wicked will soon be extinguished, and his transient mirth be exchanged for everlasting darkness and despair.—Even, when men grow rich and great in a course of ungodliness; besides the secret curse of God, which eats out all the comfort of their prosperity, and often diminishes their ill-gotten wealth, their affluence and grandeur expose them to the envy, enmity, and rapacity of their less successful rivals, to whose rebuke the poor are strangers: and should they be able to ransom their lives by their wealth, they cannot in the same way bribe the great Judge of the world, or redeem their souls from hell.—The pride also, and ambition of ungodly men commonly involve them in quarrels destructive of their comfort and that of their families. From this source, not only domestic discords, and fierce contentions between the nearest relations, arise, but ruinous lawsuits, fatal duels, and perpetuated implacable resentments. Whereas, true religion teaches us to be humble, harmless, meek, patient, and forgiving; to conquer our own spirits by looking to the example of the bleeding Saviour, and to overcome our enemies by persevering kindness.—Thus "only by pride cometh contention; but with the well-advised," who are taught by the word of God, is wisdom: and every Christian finds, that he enjoys peace and happiness, in exact proportion as he exercises meekness, forbearance, and love.—It is indeed allowed, that our gracious God, for wise and holy purposes, defers the hope of those who seek his holy consolations; and often pains their hearts while he proves their sincerity, abates their self-confidence, and excites their earnest exertions: but when the desired peace and joy are given, (and there will be no useless delay,) it will prove a tree of life, and satisfy their souls with inexpressible delight. And if the earnest be so sweet, what will the incorruptible inheritance itself be? But while we wait for this blessedness, let us recollect the painful feelings of such as wait for good, and experience delays and disappointments; and never prolong the uneasiness of those who expect relief from us, when we can with propriety at once fill their hearts with gladness.

V. 13—25. Again and again, because of our unteachableness, we are reminded, that "poverty and shame shall be to him that despiseth instruction;" and that "whoever despiseth the word of God, shall be destroyed: while he that regardeth reproof, and feareth the commandment, shall be honoured and rewarded." And indeed, every reflecting man's observation or experience must confirm the truth of these maxims; and make it evident, that "the law of the wise is a fountain of life, to depart from the snares of death."—"A good understanding," especially that which the intelligent Christian possesses, conciliates respect and favour, and introduces a man to many advantages, and opportunities of usefulness: whereas irreligion generally makes way for those vices, which imbitter this present life, and render the thoughts of another most dreadful.—Again, prudent men, observing the counsels of the Bible, conduct their affairs with caution, and deal with knowledge, in forming and executing their plans: but they, who foolishly reject the instructions of the sacred oracles, though considered by themselves or their admirers, as politic and sagacious men, often venture on perilous undertakings, engage in ruinous contests, and lay open their folly to the view of all men.—It should also be considered, that nothing inspires such fortitude and perseverance in the pursuit of objects worthy of our desires, as faith in the truths and promises of Scripture; nothing so strengthens the soul for exertion and self-denial; nothing so animates a man to lay aside every weight, that he may run with patience the race set before him. The zealous Christian therefore will most enjoy the pleasure of having his desires accomplished: while those, to whom "it is an abomination to depart from evil," will find, that their ineffectual wishes, temporary convictions, and feeble endeavours, serve only to increase the bitterness of their final disappointment.—They who sustain the character of ministers are especially concerned in these important words; "A wicked messenger falleth into mischief, but a faithful ambassador is health." They whose ignorance, (the effect of negligence,) whose vices, sloth, or unfaithfulness, have prejudiced, deceived, and ruined the souls of others, will themselves be most miserable: but the vigilant and skilful, the exemplary and faithful servant of God, while he is the messenger of salvation to others, will himself soon hear the gracious words, "Well done, good and faithful servant, enter thou into the joy of thy Lord."—In every way "evil pursueth sinners:" the very persons with whom they associate, on whom they lavish their favours, and who pretend to be their friends, help forward their destruction: their temporal concerns are often neglected, for want of judgment; their spiritual always; and the wealth, of which some are possessed, is laid up for the righteous and their posterity.—How wonderful then it is, that if the young and experienced overlook these truths, the aged, the fathers of families, should so little regard them, either in their own behalf or that of their children! and should so mistake in their expressions of affection to those whom they tenderly love, as if a part of themselves!—Yet it may be asserted, without dread of refutation, that the errors of parents in educating their children are entirely as pernicious, as the rashness and self-indulgence of young persons.—Perhaps the modern improvement of sparing the rod and spoiling the child, and of teaching children various kinds of knowledge, without habituating them to submit to superiors, to apply at stated times to things useful, and to exercise self-denial, has not only made way for much profligacy, but has also introduced a system of insubordination which has shaken Europe to its very centre. Obedience to the authority of parents, even in infancy, is the best preparation for subjection to every ordinance of man in future life; nay, it is a grand mean of bringing young persons to submit to God, as inuring them to the idea, that self-will must be subdued. And when destructive and irrational fondness prevent parents from thus subduing the rebellious spirits of their children; the event will generally prove, that their worst enemies could not have done them a greater injury.—It should, however, be observed, that correction is properly the province of parents: and that important and delicate trust can seldom be safely delegated, at least it should be done with great caution. For when this exercise of authority is separated from tender affection, it often becomes a species of tyranny, productive of most pernicious consequences. How dire then the effect, when the parent himself, not knowing how to govern his passions, sets his child an evidently bad example, even when correcting him for his faults! In general, no man can well govern others, who cannot govern himself: and it too often happens, that chastisement, having been neglected in early years, and afterwards attempted with violence and severity, drives young persons for refuge among bad companions, renders the company of the parent terrible, or at least unpleasant, and lays way for a ruinous alienation in future life. Happy then are those young persons, whom early and judicious correction, good instruction, with kind and wise regard to their time of life, have taught to consider their parents as their best friends and counsellors, and their most pleasant companions, nay, their most faithful confidants! In this way they will readily be led to "walk with wise men," and so learn wisdom. They will also be inured to application, and form habits of industry, which even in the lowest condition seldom fail of securing a comfortable support with a good conscience, and a satisfied mind, which wealth cannot purchase. Nor let it be thought superfluous to remark, that "the tillage of the poor" is preferable to many of those more lucrative employments, which are little useful to society, and too often subserve their vices and follies.

NOTES.

CHAP. XIV. V. 1. A prudent woman, by her proper management of domestic concerns, exceedingly promotes the durable advantage and credit of the family to which she belongs; and even raises it from obscurity and embarrassments to permanent credit and prosperity. But an indiscreet woman, who wastes time, and squanders away money in vain ornaments, trifling visits, and expensive pleasures, often proves the ruin of her family; even though it hath been in a thriving condition, and though her husband be frugal and industrious: for she acts as if she would pull down the house with her own hands. This coincides with a common observation, 'That a fortune in a wife, is better than a fortune with a wife.'

V. 2. "The tree must be known by its fruits;" and a man's conduct, as it is either conscientious and upright, or perverse and disobedient, shews whether he reverences or despises God.—The last clause may denote, that men of loose characters despise the piety and holiness of such as fear God and walk in his ways; "thinking it strange that they will not run with them to the same excess of riot."

V. 3. The profane, insolent, and abusive language which foolish men utter, springs from excessive pride; and whilst they smite others with it as a rod or staff, they prepare severe corrections for themselves. Whereas the prudent and conciliating words of wise men preserve them from contentions, and extricate them out of difficulties.

V. 4. 'If the fields lie fallow and be neglected, a famine must needs follow, but good husbandry bestowed on them makes great plenty.' (Bp. Patrick.)—

V. 5. (Notes, xii. 17-19. xiii. 5.)

V. 6. A scornor is one who treats divine things with profane contempt. He thinks his own understanding equal to the investigation, and even comprehension, of every subject ; he therefore rejects as false what he cannot account for, and finds contrary to his preconceived sentiments or vain reasonings ; and, indeed, all that tends to condemn his conduct, or expose his folly. In this presumptuous frame he may seek for wisdom, even in the Scriptures, without success. The state of his heart disposes him to despise the sacred mysteries, the humbling doctrines, and the holy precepts of revelation ; he will, therefore, by criticisms and bold conjectures, alter the text, or explain away its meaning. Or, disgusted by finding that those doctrines, which he dislikes, are certainly contained in the Bible, he will at length take shelter in infidelity. These are indeed modern ways in which "scorners seek wisdom, and find it not ;" but doubtless the scornors of former days had methods equally successful of evading conviction, and closing their eyes against the light of truth.—He that comes to seek after knowledge with a mind to scorn and censure, shall be sure to find enough for his humour, but none for his instruction.' (Lord Bacon.)—'This humour of deriding, springs from a great pride and conceit of their own wit, which disposes them to seek wisdom, not from others, but wholly from themselves ; and so they are not likely to find it, where it is not to be had.'—'Some, who having laughed at religion all their days, at last desire to understand it, but cannot, through their own inveterate indisposition to it.' (Bp. Patrick.)—'They seek it for their own ambition, not for God's glory, as Simon Magus.'

'Hear the just law, the judgment of the skies !

He that hates truth, shall be the dupe of lies.' (Cowper.)

But he who is humbly conscious of his ignorance and unworthiness, will search the Scriptures in a teachable spirit, and with seriousness, reverence, and prayer ; thus the Author of wisdom will deliver him from prejudice, preserve him from error and uncertainty, and shew him his truth and will. And with this state of the heart, the understanding is as well suited to receive the instructions of God's word, as sound and strong eyes are to receive the light of the sun ; so that knowledge becomes easy to those who are of an understanding heart.

V. 7. 'It is best to flee the company of such persons whose discourse thou perceivest tends to nothing but vice and mischief.' (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 8. The prudent man does not value that wisdom which consists in abstruse speculations, or profound policy ; but that which teaches him the path of safety and of duty ; and directs him to escape the dangers, avail himself of the advantages, and surmount the difficulties of his situation in life, that he may proceed with increasing satisfaction, credit, and usefulness. But that which ungodly men call wisdom, is indeed folly ; it is mere craft and imposition, which at length deceives them, and they are taken in their own net.—'New stratagems must be devised, the old failing and growing useless ; and as soon as ever a man has got the name of a cunning and crafty companion, he hath deprived himself utterly of the principal instrument for the management of his affairs, which is trust.' (Lord Bacon.)

V. 9. Foolish and profane men consider sin as a mere trifle, rather a laughing matter, than a dreadful and hateful evil. They divert themselves with tempting others to sin ; they commit iniquity without scruple, in pursuit of pleasure or gain ; and they in a jesting manner talk over their knavish or licentious practices, and recount how many they have over-reached, debauched, or surpassed in profaneness or intemperance.—The word translated mock at, signifies also palliate, or excuse. 'The remay be this sense in the words : Fools endeavour to make handsome apologies for their faults, and to find out colourable excuses for them...Or, Fools laugh and jeer at those who have committed a sin, but good men pity them, and by kind reproofs seek their amendment...'—'Or, When fools offend God, they make nothing of it ; but if good men in the least offend, they presently beg his pardon, and seek his grace and favour...The former part of the sentence may also be inverted : Sin will expose those to scorn, who are so foolish as to commit it...A good admonition to those who make a mock at sin, which will in time make a mock of them, and expose them as ridiculous fools.' (Bp. Patrick.) Indeed, these are no more than illustrations of the general exposition before given.

V. 10. No man is competent to judge of the inward anguish or pleasure of others, who are often more happy, or miserable, than they appear to be. None can tell what stings of conscience or corroding passions torment the prosperous sinner, whilst he appears gay, and indulges in mirth. Nor can ungodly men know what satisfaction a serious Christian enjoys, at a distance from scenes of vain merriment ; or even in poverty, sickness, or at the hour of death.—'We should not censure too heavily the passions of grief or joy in others, because the causes of them may be unknown to us.' (Bp. Patrick.) 'As a man's conscience is witness of his own grief, so another cannot feel the joy and comfort which a man feelth in himself.'

V. 11. The contrast between the house, or grand mansion of the wicked, and the tabernacle, or mean tent of the righteous, is specially to be noted.

V. 12. Open iniquity and impiety must seem wrong to every reflecting person. But there is another way, which joins those ways of death at last, yet at present seems right to a man. Formality, superstition, self-righteousness, enthusiasm, and, in short, all that is called religion, but is unscriptural, must certainly be intended.—'Shadows, too, often cheat us of the reality ; against which there is no remedy.' (Bp. Patrick.) This idea of a man confidently thinking himself right, till, on ending his journey, he finds he had all along been in the road to hell, is tremendous, beyond the power of expression, or even conception.

V. 13. That shew of happiness which attends laughter and noisy mirth, is a mere imposition. In the midst of such turbulent scenes the heart is often oppressed with sorrow ; and when they are over, the mind becomes more gloomy than ever. Especially when these are used as expedients to banish reflection, or quiet convictions, as they frequently are. Such ways of driving away care bring numbers to bankruptcy, and even suicide, and hurry still greater numbers into everlasting misery.

V. 14. He that forsaketh God shall be punished, and made weary of his sins, wherein he delighted.—'The backslider in heart' once appeared religious, but after a while, through persecution or temptation, he deliberately renounces his profession, and shews that the world always had his heart and supreme affections. The last state of such a man will be worse than the first ; his case is peculiarly hopeless, and he will be filled with his own devices. This was Judas's case ; he acted according to the habitual state of his heart, in betraying his Lord. But Peter, when overcome by a sudden temptation, he betrayed Christ, behaved inconsistently with his real character ; his heart was not apostate ; he repented, and was pardoned.—The latter clause may more literally be rendered, "the good man will depart from his paths." "He that is begotten of God keepeth himself, and that wicked one toucheth him not," (1 John v. 18.)—According to our translation it may be thus explained : He whose delight is in doing good, will have a spring of satisfaction in his own soul, which will preserve him from returning to the world, through desire of its friendship, or dread of its power.

V. 15. Headless and unstable men are easily imposed on, not only as to their worldly concerns, but also in religion. Confidence, insinuation, flattery, and plausible eloquence, easily entangle them in error and delusion. They are at best "children tossed to and fro by every wind of doctrine, by the sleight of men," &c. And "Satan transformed into an angel of light," fatally deceives numbers of them.—But the prudent man looks well to his "going," and the word of God teaches us more caution ; and warns us to "beware lest any man deceive us ;" and he who attends to it will shun the snares of Satan and his servants.

V. 16. A wise man fears God and hates sin, and thus he avoids the occasions and appearances of evil ; and is thankful for cautions and directions. But the foolish are self-confident, and regardless of consequences ; they are vehement in their course, and enraged at those who would give them warning or advice. Thus they rush forward to the brink of the precipice, and at length fall headlong into destruction.

V. 17. He that is hasty in resentment very foolishly exposes himself to manifold troubles, and often does much mischief, and is both pitied and blamed ; yet, he who conceals his hatred, and devises how to take deliberate revenge, is a far more odious and dangerous character.

V. 18. Careless sinners seem to claim ignorance as their patrimony, and to consider it as their privilege to act without reflection ; and thus folly, with all its consequences, will be their final portion. But the prudent consider useful knowledge as their grand object, and having obtained it, will be crowned with honour and immortality.

V. 19. It often happens, in the course of providence, that wicked men are reduced to the necessity of making submissions to the righteous, and are brought to crave their assistance and prayers. Thus the Egyptians waited on

Joseph, and Pharaoh called for Moses ; and this is a pledge of their final prevalence and pre-eminence. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 20. This is an illustration of the selfishness and dissimulation of mankind. It is evident, in fact, that when a man is impoverished, his former friends and acquaintance grow shy of him, and treat him with neglect and unkindness. But when a man grows rich, he has friends in abundance, who pretend great esteem and respect for him.

V. 21. 'But let such men know, that it is a greater sin than they imagine, and shall be severely punished, to overlook their poor neighbour, and deny him their charitable relief.' (Bp. Patrick.)—The wicked man is rather an object of pity than of contempt ; but to despise men, on account of their low circumstances or mean employment, is peculiarly foolish, and ungrateful to God, who alone has made the difference.—The latter clause is peculiarly emphatical, "Oh, the felicity of him that sheweth favour to the poor, or modest !" He shall be happy beyond expression.

V. 22. Are they not fatally deceived, who expect to prosper by craftily devising mischief ?—But they who take pains to study how to do men good, shall never fail of that bountiful reward, which is secured to them by the faithful promise of God.' (Bp. Patrick.)—They who trust in the mercy and faithfulness of God, will be followers, or imitators, of him, in their conduct towards men. They devise good, and experience abundantly the truth and goodness of God.

V. 23. 'Solomon here separates the fruit of the labour of the tongue, and of the labour of the hands ; as if want was the revenue of the one, and wealth the revenue of the other. For it commonly comes to pass, that they who talk liberally, boast much, and promise mighty things, are beggars.' (Lord Bacon.)

V. 24. When men of wisdom and piety possess riches, they do so much good with them, that they are as a crown to them, enhancing their reputation, and enlarging their sphere of usefulness. But foolish and wicked men act in character in all situations, and riches only render their folly more egregiously and emphatically foolishness.

V. 25. Deceitful, &c. "Deceit poureth out lies."—If a man be influenced by deceit, he is very ingenious in inventing, and ready in propagating, lies, without regarding the mischief arising from them ; but a faithful witness often preserves the lives of such as were in danger of perishing by false accusation.—The maxim is still more important when interpreted of the faithful minister, and the teacher of lies ; and the consequences of their conduct, in the salvation or ruin of immortal souls.

V. 26, 27. 'They who fear the Lord, have a strong ground of confidence in his promises, and will generally be preserved from distressing fears in life and death. Indeed, they are his children, and have a refuge in their Father's love, power, and truth, to which they may always resort. So that their faith and piety prove a fountain of life, to depart from the snares of death.—Some interpret the clause "his children have a place of refuge," as referring to the believer's posterity. 'His children after him may flee to God for safety, and hope to fare the better for their pious father's sake.' (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 28. 'The honour and splendour of a king depends on the multitude of his subjects ; whom therefore he ought to cherish ; for if they be wasted by unnecessary wars, or forced into other countries by oppression and unjust exactions, it proves the ruin of his kingdom.' (Bp. Patrick.)—Various other ways of discouraging population, and destroying or driving away industrious subjects, might be mentioned, and illustrated by examples, from the times of Pharaoh, to this present day. (Ex. i.)—The crusades, especially against the Albigenes, &c. ; the persecutions of the infamous Duke of Alva in the Low Countries ; the revocation of the edict of Nantz, by Lewis XIV. ; the expulsion of the Moors from Spain ; the Inquisition ; and, finally, the cruel treatment of slaves in the West Indies, which renders the detestable slave-trade in some sense necessary to prevent depopulation, are a few instances of that ruinous policy, which is here rebuked.

had formed the poor of another species, or had cast them down on purpose that they should be trampled on. The oppressor reproacheth the Lord, by despising or defying his engagement to avenge the cause of the poor and oppressed. Nay, he does his best to bring reproach on the providential government of God, in that he hath put so much into the power of such vile wretches, and connives so long at their crimes.—But every one that honours God, will, for his sake, treat the poor with compassion, and endeavour to alleviate their distresses, not to add to them.

V. 32. The wicked, (at death, for that is evidently spoken of,) is not only cast away for his crimes, but driven out of the world by irresistible force, with all his unrepented guilt on his soul, and under the power of all his domineering evil propensities and long continued bad habits ; the slave of pride, avarice, malice, envy, and other hateful passions ; "a vessel of wrath fitted for destruction : " but the righteous hath hope in his death, his sins being pardoned, and his heart renewed ; and while he gives thanks for being made meet for the inheritance of the saints in light, he trusts in the promises of God, that he shall speedily join them, and at length be reunited to those whom he most loved here on earth.—What can this proverb mean, worthy to be compared with this obvious interpretation, if we do not take in the belief and expectation of the eternal world ?

V. 33. Wisdom possesses the heart, and regulates the affections and tempers of him that hath understanding, and it is not spent in ostentatious displays. But it soon appears how the head and heart of a fool are furnished ; for he continually betrays his ignorance and wickedness, by all his words and actions, as if ambitious of being known in his true character.

V. 34. Righteousness powerfully tends to promote public peace and prosperity, and to give an ascendancy to that nation in which it generally prevails. Genuine piety is inseparably connected with industry, sobriety, equity, and mercy, and also with frugality ; and these conduce to health, population, union, and competency. Moreover, they ensure the Divine blessing to the community, which must needs exalt any nation. But every kind of sin has the contrary tendency ; the prevalence of vice and impiety is a national reproach ; conduces to disunion, weakness, and disgrace ; and exposes any people to the wrath and vengeance of God.—The word translated reproach is the same which is commonly rendered mercy or goodness, and this has given rise to other interpretations of the latter clause ; as if it meant that mercy was as a sin-offering for any people, where it prevailed ; and the margin of the old translation renders it, "but the mercy of the people is the sacrifice for sin."—Others think it relates to the Gentiles, (the word people being plural,) and they render it, "The goodness of the nations is sin ; meaning that the religion and virtues of idolaters, instead of righteousness, are sinful in the sight of God.—This interpretation is, doubtless, more scriptural than the preceding ; but as the word in question does in one place evidently mean reproach or atrocious wickedness ; (a wicked thing, Lev. xx. 17 ; ) and as a verb from the same root has clearly a similar meaning even in this book, (xxv. 10 ; ) so there appears no sufficient reason for altering our translation, and departing from the interpretation above given. The word indeed, (like some others in different languages, (Notes, Job i. 5. ii. 9.)) seems to mean what is uncommon, either of goodness or of baseness ; but more generally it is used in the former sense.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1-16. The more the religion of the Scripture is examined, the fuller must be the conviction of every impartial judge, that it is of divine original ; because in all things it is conducive, in proportion as received and practised, to the welfare of individuals, families, and nations. This appears conclusively, when we consider, that the character and conduct which scriptural principles are suited to form, would be far more eligible, in any relation, than the opposite character, even to those who are prejudiced against the principles themselves. For who would not prefer, on sober reflection, as a wife, that prudent woman, who, making the word of God her rule, takes pleasure in the concerns of the household, the care of her children, and the credit and comfort of her husband ; to one of those foolish women, whose negligence and extravagance are the ruin of so many families, and the calamity of all related to them ? Who can doubt whether the former character be not incomparably more valuable as a parent also, and as a member of the community ? Nay, posterity are greatly concerned in this remark: for prudent women are not only the stay of families, but a blessing to the rising generation, and the support of declining empires; while the foolish entail poverty, shame, and ignorance on their descendants; and bequeath as a legacy to the community, a vicious and worthless progeny.—Wherever the fear of God is the ruling principle, a man will walk in his integrity: but they who despise him and his servants, cannot reasonably be expected to be conscientious in their general behaviour. In the mouth of such men is ‘a rod of pride,’ which renders them mischievous, and exposes them to immense vexation; from which ‘the lips of the wise preserve them.’ In numerous instances, they who fear not God, declining the self-denial and fatigue of labour in any mean employment, and affecting gentility and delicacy, become the burdens and nuisances of society, which in one way or other is pillaged for their support. But humility, submission to the will of God, and the desire of living at a distance from temptation, and without injuring any one, render the pious man ready for any honest employment, and for such inconveniences as necessarily attach to it. These, therefore, form the most valuable and most comfortable part of the community; for indeed ‘where no oxen are, the crib is clean; but much increase is by the strength of the ox: and the public is as much advantaged, as the husbandman himself.—While the irreligious, to answer their wicked purposes, are induced to multiply lies, and even perjuries; and while they excuse their crimes, and make a mock at sin, the pious man strictly adheres to truth and equity, and ‘exercises himself to have a conscience void of offence towards God and man:’ for the Divine favour is his choice and object, which is with the righteous alone.—The way of peace and holiness lies open before him; because he seeks wisdom seriously and humbly from the Scriptures, and with earnest prayer that he may glorify God, and do good; but the pride, levity, and profaneness of the scorner render him incapable of distinguishing truth from falsehood, right from wrong; and his very genius and learning only make him more extensively mischievous, by propagating infidelity, heresy, or impiety, in a specious and imposing manner. Here again the ‘wisdom of the prudent, which is to understand his way,’ appears invaluable. He, ‘who fears God, and walks in his ways,’ will go from the ‘presence of the foolish man, when he perceives not in him the lips of knowledge.’ Wit, ingenuity, politeness, or eloquence, make no amends, in his judgment, for the want of seriousness, for erroneous and pernicious opinions, or scoffing and jesting at things sacred. Thus he will be kept from the fatal contagion of profane company, and that worst deceit and folly, even of fools, namely excusing vice by principles subversive of all justice and truth, as well as piety and religion.—As ‘there is a way which seemeth right unto a man, yet the end thereof are the ways of death;’ ‘the wise man feareth, and departeth from evil:’ he not only shuns the profane scoffer; but the soothing or ostentatious deceiver. While ‘the simple believeth every word,’ he prudently ‘looks well to his goings;’ for eternal happiness or misery are at stake. While ‘the fool rageth, and is confident;’ he fears lest he should be deceived, and humbly seeks to God, praying to be kept from every delusion. When he sees men, who have appeared to be religious, turn back into the ways of sin; he mourns over them, foreseeing the awful consequences; and becomes more jealous of himself, and watchful over his own heart: and knoweth, that in general, they that forsake God do it, ‘loving this present world;’ he becomes more and more afraid of covetousness, and often seems to hear the Saviour caution him, as he did the disciples of old, ‘Remember Lot’s wife!’ and remember that ‘the house of the wicked shall be overthrow; but the tabernacle of the upright shall flourish.’—It is indeed of the greatest importance to possess a source of consolation, independent of all outward things: and this is the peculiar advantage of the pious man, and the means of preserving him from temptation.—External appearances are very inadequate evidences of a man’s happiness or misery. Even in the midst of prosperity and laughter, sinners are conscious that they are not happy. They often strive to repress their sighs, to silence their consciences, and to quiet their fears: but they will find their sensual mirth end at length in weeping, wailing, and gnashing of teeth. And as none but themselves know the bitterness of their hearts in their hours of solitude; so none, but the true believer can understand the nature of that serious joy, which is possessed in communion with God, and in the hope and first-fruits of heaven: with this no stranger can intermeddle, this no event can destroy, or long suspend; and this causes the Christian to cease from envying the prosperous sinner: it mars his relish for worldly pleasure, and turns the balance of happiness vastly in his favour, even amidst the trials of life. Let then the sons of vanity and sensuality possess their inheritance of folly, unenvied but not unpitied: and let every believer rejoice with gratitude, and say, ‘The lines are fallen to me in pleasant places, yea, I have a goodly heritage.’

V. 17—35. These verses only give us another view of the advantages which true religion confers on the possessor, and on others by his means.—Whilst the passionate man exalteth folly, and rashly plungeth himself into discord and mischief, by which he becomes wretched and contemptible, whilst the malicious is hated for his sullen devices of revenge; and whilst the envious torments himself because of the success of his competitors, the Christian is instructed to exercise meekness and forgiveness, to be contented and benevolent, and to take pleasure in witnessing and aiding the success and comfort of all around him. He sheweth his superiority of understanding by being slow to anger; and increasing knowledge crowns him with true honour. For wisdom resides in the heart, to direct a man’s judgment, and moderate his desires; and thus, without ostentation, it appears in his life and actions: whilst fools continually expose themselves by their vain boastings, as well as by their ill behaviour. But, in all cases, a sound heart, and well-governed passions, are life and comfort; while every domineering sinful temper is as rottenness in the bones.—Again, view that part of ungodly men who seek affluence as their chief good, and expect happiness in worshipping mammon. How do these men oppress the poor by merciless exactions, by defrauding them of their wages, and by numberless methods of injustice and cruelty! But, while they thus reproach and despise the common Creator of rich and poor, and of the whole human race, and glory, as it were, in their ingratitude to their benefactor, do they not also become most worthless and pernicious members of society? and are they not, by corroding suspicions, harassing fears, and turbulent passions, wretched amidst their immense possessions, and multiplied indulgences?—‘The wicked is like the troubled sea, whose waters cast forth mire and dirt. There is no peace, saith my God, for the wicked.’ Now, contemplate the opposite character.—He who honours God, has mercy on the poor. He dares not, nay, he is not inclined to despise the mean appearance, or uncouth behaviour, of his neighbour, in whatever clime he was born, or of whatever complexion; but, as he would be happy himself, so he would endeavour to promote the happiness of others; and he finds it an accession to his own comfort to relieve their distresses. He feels his need of the mercy and truth of God, in order to the salvation of his soul; and he copies them in devising to do good to the afflicted who expect it from him. Thus, he best consults his own good; ‘for, do they not err, who devise evil,’ when in the ‘fear of the Lord is strong confidence,’ and none but his children can have a refuge in the approaching hour of death, and day of judgment? Let us, then, now seek to this fountain of life, that we may escape the snares of death, and be safe and confident, when the wicked are sinking in consternation and despair.—It is no less evident that righteousness is the grand support of nations; and that sin cuts the sinews, and undermines the foundations, of every community in which it prevails. And though the long suffering of God hath hitherto spared this nation for the sake of a small remnant, which he hath reserved to himself: yet, as sin is become the reproach, so it will be the ruin of our favoured land, except a general reformation take place; for it will at length be found to be universally true, that ‘the evil bow before the good, and the wicked at the gates of the righteous.’ The wise and pious are therefore the best patriots: by their examples, prayers, labours, and influence, they endeavour to stem the torrent of infidelity, profaneness, profligacy, and iniquity, and to promote that righteousness which alone establisheth prosperity. Wisdom and piety form, also, the grand qualifications of good princes. Such will not waste the lives, or drain off the riches, of their subjects by needless wars, to gratify their own ambition, rapacity, or revenge: they will not destroy or drive away the people by oppression, persecution, or bloody executions, or exorbitant taxes; nay, they will study to preserve peace, plenty, and good order, and the impartial administration of justice, and to encourage industry and ingenuity. This will induce strangers to come and settle in the land, and ‘in the multitude of the people is the king’s honour; but in the want of people is the destruction of the prince.’ At the same time they will, by their example and influence, and every scriptural means, endeavour to promote the spread of vital godliness. As ‘their favour will be shewn to the wise and righteous, and their wrath will be against those that cause shame,’ they will be rid of corrupt ministers as soon as they detect them; and will employ those who heartily concur in their wise, equitable, and pious measures; and happy will that people be, who are in such a case.—But as genuine religion is in every thing most excellent, so we are required to be peculiarly upon our guard against counterfeits; for prejudice, ignorance, and fashion, even canonize false schemes of religion. Here, then, we should learn to distinguish betwixt the faithful witness who will not lie, and who delivereth souls, and those deceitful witnesses who speak lies, either through ignorance, or hypocrisy, for filthy lucre’s sake, and to the destruction of their hearers. If we carefully compare their lives and doctrine with the word of God, we shall soon learn to know one from the other. And this distinction is far more important with respect to those witnesses who speak from the pulpit, than those who bear their testimony in courts of justice; and the false witnesses are, alas! in the former case, far more numerous in proportion.—The importance of this remark will appear most evident, when the wicked is driven by death, from all his possessions and enjoyments, under the wrath of God, and the power of his lusts, into the eternal world; and when the righteous shall rejoice in hope of a blessed immortality, without sin or sorrow, in the presence of his Lord: and this will reconcile him to the separating stroke, and smooth the countenance of the king of terrors.—Let us also endeavour always to be well employed, ‘for in all labour there is profit;’ but, in every thing, the mere talk of the lips tendeth only to penury. And let those, to whom the Lord hath given riches, endeavour to shew their wisdom by making a good use of them: for thus they will be a crown to them; otherwise, they will only enable them to be more conspicuously and perniciously foolish. ‘Tis true that, at present, many will profess to esteem and respect them, merely because they are rich; and the poor, however wise and pious, will be despised and hated, because he is poor. But ere long, Lazarus will be honoured, as well as comforted, and Dives despised, as well as tormented. For ‘the favour of our King will,’ uniformly, ‘be toward the wise servant; but his wrath will be against him that causeth shame.’

which move men either to give ill words, or to return worse to those which are given them; endeavouring to overcome by sharpness and bitterness, not by lenity and moderation.' (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 2. Wise men know how to communicate knowledge, as circumstances require, in the most acceptable and useful manner: but even the learning and right notions which wicked men obtain, as well as their errors and follies, are poured out so indiscriminately, that they do more harm than good.—It is indeed evident, that many have good capacities and considerable knowledge, who totally want judgment and discretion for improving them.

V. 3. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 4. 'The healing of the tongue is a tree of life.' When a man is able and willing to speak for the instruction of the ignorant, the encouragement of the troubled conscience or afflicted heart, the calming of the spirits of those who are enraged, and the healing of differences among neighbours, his tongue is as a tree of life; it will, as it were, create a paradise around him, and exceedingly promote the comfort, peace, and salvation of mankind. But proud, passionate, scurrilous, and exasperating language makes breaches upon a man's spirit; it throws him off his guard, distresses his mind, misleads his judgment, excites his anger, and brings guilt on his conscience.—The same word signifies both spirit and wind. 'Perverseness,' in the tongue, 'is like a blustering wind among the boughs of trees; rending and tearing the life and spirit of a man's self and others.' (Bp. Hall.)

V. 5. (Note, xlii. 1.) 'He that profits by instruction and correction, when a child, is likely to become a prudent man.'

V. 6. A moderate provision, a contented mind, and confidence in God, are an inestimable treasure in the house of the righteous, both for the good of them, and of their children after them. But the large revenues of wicked men increase their fears and suspicions; add strength to their passions, augment their pride and impatience of contradiction, expose them to envy and enmity, engage them in discords, tempt them to inordinate and injurious indulgence, bring guilt upon their consciences, and render the fears of death and judgment doubly distressing.

V. 7. Knowledge, like wealth, is valuable in proportion as it is communicated with prudence and propriety. To acquire useful knowledge, therefore, is a great object to a wise man, who would glorify God, and do good; but to find out, and embrace opportunities of communicating it, in the most extensive measure, and in such ways as render the imparted instruction permanent in its effects, is the grand improvement of the talent, when acquired, and of the influence it gives. Thus the apostles scattered the knowledge of Christ by preaching and writing, through the nations; and the fruit remains to this day.—But men of knowledge, who do not impart instruction, are misers among the learned, in the world, and in the church: and ignorant men have nothing worth communicating, so that they are beggarly, lazy spendthrifts.

V. 8, 9. The most costly sacrifices of the wicked, under the Mosaic law, must have been an abomination to the Lord; because their whole way was abominable to him, and because of their corrupt motives: and the case is precisely the same, with all external acts of worship, nay, with the largest oblations and most liberal alms, of the impenitent and unbelieving, under the Christian dispensation. For, by them, they either mean nothing determinate, or they intend to cover their sins, to bribe their Judge, to make compensation for past, or to purchase indulgences for future, transgressions; they put their vices in the stead either of Christ's atonement, or of holy obedience; they present them with hypocritical hearts; and they grossly affront the holy God, by supposing that he can be imposed on by forms or gifts, or pleased by them, whilst they are enemies to his justice, his authority, and his grace. But will the greatest of sinners, if he desires to repent, or seek salvation, be rejected? By no means, when this desire brings the poor murderer, or thief, to cry for mercy in the Redeemer's name, he begins to offer 'the prayer of the upright, in which God delighteth:' and may be sure of acceptance, in proportion as he is ashamed on account of former crimes and present unworthiness: and as in brokenness of heart, he dares not lift up his eyes unto heaven, but at a humble distance smites upon his breast, crying "God be merciful to me, a sinner."—Such intimations, under the law, were a kind of prophecy, that another and more spiritual dispensation was at hand.

V. 10. 'He that swerveth from the word of God cannot abide to be admonished.' Sharp and grievous rebukes must be inflicted on him that refuseth instruction: and if he set himself against these, he will finally perish, as incorrigible.

V. 11. Abaddon, the word here rendered destruction, sometimes means the devil, the destroyer; and the verse may denote, that the deepest machinations of the prince of hell, and of all his legions of fallen angels, are open to the Lord's inspection, and must end in their disappointment and deeper torment: how then can man, who is so inferior in sagacity and subtlety, expect to hide his counsels from God, or to prosper in rebellion against him? (Marg. Ref.) 'There is nothing so deep and secret, that can be hid from the eyes of God, much less man's thoughts.'

V. 12. 'Every one that doeth evil hateth the light, neither cometh to the light, lest his deeds should be reprov'd: but he that doeth truth cometh to the light, that his deeds may be made manifest, that they are wrought in God.' (John iii. 20, 21.)—"Behold, a greater than Solomon is here."

V. 13. (15.) A peaceful conscience, a joyful hope, and a contented mind, give habitual and substantial cheerfulness, conduce to health, and tend greatly to a man's success in every useful undertaking.—But a gloomy, unthankful, envious, impatient spirit, arising from pride, an evil conscience, and attachment to worldly objects, and disappointments about them, breaks the spring and vigour of the mind, and renders a man uneasy to himself and others, as well as inactive and unfit for service.

V. 14. Feedeth, &c. Empty, curious speculations, or the imposture of the day, are the very food of profane and sensual minds; who can credit any absurdity, if it do not disquiet their consciences, affront their pride, or militate against their lusts. Such foolish persons are found in every age, of every rank, and among the learned as well as the unlearned. As the ignorant can feed upon transubstantiation, purgatory, and indulgences, or the wildest absurdities of enthusiasm: so learned men can relish the more refined, but not less absurd, speculations of sceptics and infidels; till, professing themselves wise, they become fools, doubt of every thing, or even deny the existence of the God that made them. Alas! how do the mouths of numbers, not only pour out such foolishness, but greedily devour it, as if it were the most delicious and wholesome food of the soul!

V. 15. Affliction, or poverty, without a cheerful spirit, renders a man's life wretched; but with it much habitual satisfaction may be enjoyed even in very unfavourable circumstances. 'A mind conscious of good intentions, though success be wanting, affords truer and purer joy, than all that the world can furnish a man withal.' (Lord Bacon.)—The original is good of heart, and seems to denote that inward peace, which springs from the testimony of conscience, and submissive confidence in God.—Some render the clause, "The good of heart are a continual feast:" their company is peculiarly pleasant and desirable.

V. 16. (Notes, Ps. xxxvii. 16.)

V. 17, 18. 'The meanest fare with the love of him who invites, and with agreement among the guests, is much better than the most sumptuous entertainments of him that hate us, or among those that quarrel.—A man prone to wrath will easily disturb the most peaceable companies: but a meek and patient person is so far from raising strife, that he will endeavour to compose it, where he finds it begun by others.' (Bp. Patrick.) Thus some connection has been supposed between these two maxims: but each of them is capable of a much more extensive application; in respect of the true enjoyment of life, and the peace of families, neighbourhoods, churches, and nations. "If there be any comfort of love:" "Blessed are the peace-makers:" "For the wrath of man worketh not the righteousness of God." (Note, i.)

V. 19. Whatever a sluggard has to do, seems full of intolerable difficulties; like a man's forcing his way repeatedly through a hedge of thorns: and indeed his delays tend to increase his perplexities, and expose him to many sufferings, him that forsaketh the way, and he that hath reproof shall die."—Forgetfulness of God is the great source of all the other sins and follies into which men are hurried by their passions: for did they well consider, that "the eyes of the LORD are in every place, beholding the evil and the good;" and that hell and destruction are before him; much more the hearts of the children of men; they must be restrained in their evil courses by dread of his almighty indignation. But "God is not in all their thoughts;" and therefore their ways are an abomination unto him. Would we then be found among those who "follow after righteousness," and "whom the LORD loveth;" let these thoughts be habitually in our minds: "thou God seest me;" thou seest my most secret desires and motives; "thou requirest truth in the inward parts;" "the sacrifice of the wicked is an abomination to thee, but 'the prayer of the upright is thy delight.'" For these considerations are peculiarly suited to arm our minds against temptation: and to animate our hope of his mercy and favour.—It is of great importance to have right principles early imprinted in the minds of young persons. Alas, how few parents continually endeavour, by instruction, conversation, and example, to convince their children, that "better is a little with the fear of the LORD, than great treasure, and trouble therewith!" How few seem to believe it themselves! yet it is the sure testimony of God; and confirmed by universal experience and observation. For indeed "godliness with contentment is great gain;" and they who possess it, have all and abound, even when the carnal eye sees very little: they have treasures in heaven, and treasures in the heart, and in the house: their present wants are supplied, and the LORD is with them as their portion and their treasure, to supply their temporal wants, without the cares, troubles, and temptations, which accompany the revenues of the wicked. Brotherly love and harmony likewise, spring from love to God, and their sense of his love to them: and this renders a dinner of herbs more relishing, than the most luxurious feasts of those, who "are living in malice and envy, hateful, and hating one another." And as riches too commonly increase pride, and furnish abundant causes of litigation; the rich are seldom exempt from wrath, envy, and strife, which spoil all their enjoyment. By faith and prayer, they who fear the LORD and hope in his mercy, derive from him inward consolations: the discoveries, which they make of the glory of God and the excellency of heavenly things, rejoice their hearts; and the glad tidings and precious promises of the gospel, comfort and nourish their souls. A merry heart thus obtained maketh a cheerful countenance, and is a continual feast; but all other mirth is madness. Nay, even the sorrow of the world worketh death; cares, fears, disappointments, loss of friends, and other trials, when there is no hope in God or submission to him, induce sullen despondency, break the spirit, render life miserable, shorten a man's days, or even tempt him to suicide. But the grace of God teaches patience and thankfulness for remaining unmerited mercies, and inspires hope; and thus enables a man to be joyful in tribulations. Even godly sorrow has its peculiar sweetness and supports; it breaks the heart into a penitent submissive frame, and makes way for joy in the LORD. And if any pious persons are dejected; this arises, either from some misapprehension, or from the want of a more single and devoted frame of mind. We should therefore cultivate cheerfulness; lest we bring an evil report on our profession, and cause the inexperienced to conclude that we serve a hard master, and that wisdom's ways are not pleasantness and peace.

V. 19—33. A considerable part of the miseries of life, and even of the consolation of professed Christians, arises from sloth and procrastination, which also very generally occasion the ruin of men's immortal souls. For the way of the sluggard is, in every thing, like pressing through a thorn-hedge; a thousand hinderances and difficulties obstruct his path, which he has not vigour to break through; thus many are all their life uneasy, because indolent; they live in continual war with their own consciences, and in doubt about their state, because in continual neglect of some part of their duty; but the path of the wise and consistent Christian, who is diligent in his proper work, and exercises himself to have a conscience void of offence, becomes plain and pleasant. In like manner, many form very good designs, which come to nothing for want of due deliberation and advising with prudent counsellors; and thus disappointment enhances their uneasiness; whilst a man's purposes being established gives him inward satisfaction. That greediness of gain also, which springs from ignorance or neglect of a better inheritance, whether a man be rapacious in order to hoard or to squander, instead of producing an accession to his happiness, proves a perpetual source of uneasiness to himself and family; whereas the disdain of filthy lucre conduces more to comfort, than the largest gains of ungodliness possibly could. But this "way of life is above to the wise;" and fools never raise their hearts or thoughts high enough to desire, or even conceive of, such pleasures, honours, and treasures, as are found in it; but cleaving to the dust, or grovelling in the mire of sinful pursuits, they fall into hell beneath. For, refusing instruction, delighting in folly and mischief, and not so much as regarding whether an aged father or a tender mother rejoice or mourn over them; numbers reduce to practice the abominable thoughts of their hearts, till shame and conscience make little resistance, and till their crimes, by necessary consequence, plunge them into ruin without remedy.—But the pure in heart speak such things as are pleasing to God and useful to man, and such as will give them satisfaction when afterwards recollected, especially at the day of judgment. They "study to answer," and often are enabled to speak a word in season, unspeakably more valuable than gold or precious stones; and they will eventually find, that the LORD heard and answered, in the best manner, all their prayers; for He giveth wisdom, strength, victory, and joy. Let then the hearts of those rejoice who seek his face; let the fatherless and widow trust in him; and let the haughty oppressor tremble before him: "for he will destroy the house of the proud, but he will establish the border of the widow." And let us all remember that the fear of God is the instruction of wisdom; and that before durable honour is humility: for He causes every man to feel his own vileness and poverty, before he confers on him wisdom, righteousness, honour, and immortality; or employs him in any very honourable and useful service.

NOTES.

CHAP. XVI. V. 1. The grace of God alone prepares the heart for every good work; and the wisdom which he gives, dictates every prudent and pious answer and observation which we make: "From him all holy desires, all good counsels, and all just works do proceed."—This is a scriptural and obvious exposition of the verse, as it stands in our translation: but the original does not seem to admit of it. Literally it is, "To man the orderings of the heart; and from JEHOVAH, the answer of the tongue." Man may form his plans according to the desires of his heart, and he may purpose what he will speak, on any important occasion; but at the last God will so order it, that nothing shall be said but what serves to accomplish his purposes. Thus Balaam could only speak that which God put into his mouth; though his love for "the wages of unrighteousness," made him very desirous of cursing Israel.—"Man revolves innumerable thoughts in his mind, but he cannot even list them, or move his tongue without God."—He derideth the presumption of man, who dareth to attribute to himself any thing, as to prepare his heart; seeing he is not able to speak a word, except God give it him.

V. 2. Ignorance, pride, and self-flattery render men very partial judges in their own cause; so that, in general, they vindicate or palliate the most evident iniquity or profligacy, in their own case, and still more their neglect of God and religion. But the LORD judges with perfect impartiality, and with complete knowledge of the motives of every heart, and he decides upon every action and character, according to the immutable standard of his holy law; no wonder then that his decisions are so different from those which men form of themselves.

V. 3. Whatever a man undertakes according to the will of God, either in his personal concerns, or in those of a more public nature, he ought to put it into his hands, to be disposed of and prospered by him as he pleases. Then he will avoid anxiety, and cheerfully use the proper means; and his purposes will be established and accomplished, as far as is for his true interest.

V. 4. The LORD orders and governs all things, with a view to the display of his own perfections, that they may be known and adored by his rational creatures: he is his own great end in all his works; and though some of his creatures have apostatized and rebelled against him, even they, though undesignedly, aid in displaying his glory. He is not the author of their wickedness; but he foresaw it, and formed his plan with a view to it. Contrary to their intentions, he uses their agency to accomplish many of his wise and holy purposes; he makes use of the malevolence of some wicked men to execute righteous vengeance on others; and he will at last be glorified by their final destruction, in the day of wrath and revelation of his righteous judgment. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 5. (Marg. Ref. Note, xi. 21.)

V. 6. Mercy and truth are constantly united in Scripture, when the forgiveness and salvation of sinners are spoken of. "Grace and truth came by Jesus Christ;" but nothing can be more contrary to the general tenor of the sacred oracles, than to suppose that the kindness, compassion, or faithfulness of one man to another can expiate (for this the original means) the guilt of his sins before God. The verse therefore seems to mean, "By the mercy and truth of God, through the promised Saviour," an expiation has been devised and revealed for taking away the sins of the world, and pardons actually granted to believers; and when sinners are brought to fear God, they repent, and do works meet for repentance; and walk in newness of life. Some indeed explain it of the happy effects arising from the exercise of mercy and truth, in averting national judgments, and their remarks are worthy attention; but yet the term covered or expiated, does not admit of this construction. These things may be a "lengthening of tranquillity;" but they cannot be a propitiation for sin.

V. 7. "The best way to have our enemies reconciled to us, is for us first to be reconciled to God."—"When all their actions and designs are such as he approves, he inclines those who were their foes to be at peace with them." (Bp. Patrick.) (Marg. Ref.)

9 A man's heart deviseth his way : but the LORD directeth his steps.

10 A divine sentence is in the lips of the king : his mouth transgresseth not in judgment.

11 A just weight and balance are the LORD's : all the weights of the bag are his work.

12 It is an abomination to kings to commit wickedness : for the throne is established by righteousness.

13 Righteous lips are the delight of kings ; and they love him that speaketh right.

14 The wrath of a king is as messengers of death : but a wise man will pacify it.

15 In the light of the king's countenance is life ; and his favour is as a cloud of the latter rain.

16 How much better is it to get wisdom than gold ? and to get understanding rather to be chosen than silver ?

17 The highway of the upright is to depart from evil : he that keepeth his way preserveth his soul.

18 Pride goeth before destruction, and a haughty spirit before a fall.

V. 8. 'A small estate, honestly got and charitably enjoyed, is much to be preferred to vast incomes, heaped up by oppression, and kept without hospitality.' (Bp. Patrick.)—So indeed is the scanty maintenance earned by hard but honest labour. (Note, Psalm xxxvii. 16.)

V. 9. 'He sheweth the folly of man, which thinketh that his ways are in his own hand ; yet is notable to move one foot, except God give him leave.' (Note 1. Marg. Ref.)

V. 10. 'As the future is often used for the imperative in the original Scriptures, (though, perhaps, not so frequently as translators have supposed,) this verse may be rendered, "Let a divine sentence be in the lips of the king ; let not his mouth transgress in judgment." Undoubtedly, this is the meaning of the maxim. It shews how wise and good kings do act, and how all kings ought to act. Their edicts and decisions should, without exception, be the result of heavenly wisdom and justice ; and they ought to be the more careful to avoid errors or partial decrees, as there is no appeal on earth from their tribunal.—Who would have expected to have found in this proverb a proof of the pope's infallibility ? yet it hath actually been brought forward as one ! 'If kings are infallible, much more popes.' Arguments must be extremely scarce, where such are alleged.

V. 11. 'If they be true and just, they are God's work, and he delighteth therein : but, otherwise, if they be false, they are the work of the devil, and to the condemnation of those that use them.—Kings should not only do justice themselves, but see that their subjects do justice to each other, not thinking the inspection of weights and measures, and such other matters as may prevent fraud and oppression, beneath their notice ; as the Lord himself peculiarly notices them, and accounts a just weight and balance his own work, his own appointment and delight.

V. 12, 13. These verses are, in some versions, rendered imperatively : 'Let it be an abomination to kings, &c. As wickedness is more pernicious and abominable in kings than in other men, seeing they are the delegates of heaven for the punishment of evil-doers, so they ought to abominate it more than other men, and consider righteousness as the basis and support of their thrones. They should therefore discourage all flatterers, calumniators, officious informers, and lying teachers ; and delight in those alone who speak the words of truth and righteousness.—They who adhere to our translation, feel the necessity of supplying the epithet good to the kings of whom they speak.

V. 14, 15. The monarchs of the East had the power of life and death, without any check or control, and often sent messengers to inflict vengeance at once on such as had offended them. A wise man would therefore be very careful not to provoke one so powerful ; or, if he had inadvertently given offence, he would make every allowable submission, in order to pacify him : and many would be candidates for the favour of a sovereign who could so much promote their prosperity. (Marg. Ref.) But this ought to have been an additional reason to these princes why their frowns and favours should be directed entirely according to the good or bad behaviour of those around them.—The word rendered pacify is the same as that before translated purge iniquity. (Note 6 :) but here man, not God, is spoken of. We may compensate for our offences against our fellow-creatures, but not for our sins against God.

V. 16. 'Wisdom is, after all, eminently preferable to all the wealth or preferment which the favour of the mightiest princes can bestow.' (Notes, ii. iii.)

V. 17. He that is upright before God, goes further and further from evil, as a man travels on a high road without diverting from it ; and, in keeping his way, he preserveth his soul. (Note, Rom. ii. 7—11.)

riches of the world, and in contesting with other haughty and rapacious rivals for the same idolized objects.

V. 20. 'He that understands his business thoroughly, and manages it prudently, is likely to have good success ; but none so happy, as he that confides more in the LORD, than in his own skill and industry.' (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 21. The man, whose wisdom regulates his temper and affections, and directs his conduct, will, at length, be more honoured for prudence, than many who possess the most shining talents : and if he have the gift of conversing or teaching in a convincing and persuasive manner, he has a vast advantage for communicating the knowledge of divine truth to others.—'Profoundness of wisdom may help men to fame and admiration, but it is eloquence which prevails in business, and active life.' (Lord Bacon.)—This is ingenious ; but it can hardly be thought the meaning of the proverb : for the Scriptures by no means recommend that eloquence, which often gives bad men, and a bad cause, the ascendancy in the most important transactions ; and bears down wisdom, truth, and justice, by its fascinating delusions.

V. 22. 'If fools undertake to instruct others, they only make them like themselves.' (Bp. Patrick.)—Understanding is to the possessor a fountain of life, whence salutary streams flow all around him, communicating the instructions of life to others also ; (1 John, vii. 37—39 :) but, on the contrary, fools pour forth foolishness, like poisonous streams, and by their baneful instructions widely propagate vice, impiety, and pernicious errors of every kind. (Note, xv. 2.) Some understand the last clause to mean, "It is folly to instruct fools." It is labour lost. (Note, ix. 7—9.)

V. 23. The wise man's self-knowledge and acquaintance with his own heart in the various circumstances of life, joined with his careful observation of men, will always suggest something proper to be spoken to others, according to their characters and situations ; as the accurate knowledge of anatomy directs the experienced and sagacious physician in respect of the causes of diseases, and the methods of cure. Thus he is enabled to communicate knowledge pertinently, judiciously, and successfully.

V. 24. 'The sweet words of consolation which come forth of a godly heart. (Notes, xii. 18, 19. xxiv. 13, 14.)

V. 25. (Note xiv. 12.)

V. 26. Men must needs labour, for their appetites continually crave supply ; and, eventually, they enjoy the benefit of their labour. Thus we must either labour for the meat which endureth unto everlasting life, or perish. The verse, however, may be translated very differently : "The soul of him that is troublesome shall suffer trouble, for his mouth will be turned upon him."—'He cannot speak so much as an evil word, but it will return upon him, and fly in his own face.' (Bp. Patrick.)—The original word rendered labour, signifies either to take pains, or to molest others.

V. 27. Ungodly men frequently bestow more pains to do mischief, than would be needful in order to do good. They dig for evil, as if delving in a mine for the precious metals ; they make diligent search to find out some occasion of discord or calumny ; their lips are set on fire of hell, and kindle the flame of contention in families and communities, or the flames of lust in the hearts of others. 'His tongue is a burning firebrand, to set all the world in combustion.' (Bp. Hall.) The Septuagint thus translates this proverb, 'The perverse man carries perdition on his own mouth. The foolish man diggett up evils to himself ; he treasures up fire on his own lips.'—Hear now the observation of a popish interpreter, and, it is said, one of the most learned and judicious among them, on this passage : 'This is apparent by the example of the Spanish Inquisition, whereby he that speaketh any thing rashly against the faith, is deservedly delivered to the fire, which I wish were done every where. (Maldonate.) Thus, in the most literal sense, this Jesuit's lips are a burning fire, in which he would have us not only singed, but devoured.' (Bp. Patrick.)

29 A <sup>d</sup>violent man enticeth his neighbour, and leadeth him into the way that is not good.

30 He <sup>s</sup>hutteth his eyes to devise froward things: <sup>m</sup>oving his lips he bringeth evil to pass.

31 The <sup>h</sup>oary head is a crown of glory, <sup>h</sup>if it be found in the way of righteousness.

32 He <sup>t</sup>hat is slow to anger is better than the mighty; <sup>a</sup>nd he that ruleth his spirit than he that taketh a city.

Let it not be forgotten, that this inquisition still is in existence, and active, though the order of the Jesuits is abrogated.

V. 28. In various ways perverse men sow the seeds of strife and mischief. The whisperer, for instance, by hints, surmises, misrepresentations and slanders, not only sets the nearest friends and relations at variance, but excites jealousies among nobles and princes, whence spring seditions, and destructive wars between nations, and even between the inhabitants of the same nation. Being a child of the devil, he is tormented at seeing others happy, and can only find relief in doing mischief, and rendering mankind miserable. What a hateful, yet what a common character!

V. 29, 30. (Notes, i. 10—19. vi. 12—15.) 'Another sort (of the men of Belial) live by rapine, and persuade others to enter into their society. With profound study they contrive the ruin of others; and the signal being given, they furiously execute the mischief they have designed.' (Bp. Patrick.) 'This man is a furnace of mischief;' (the man described in these verses.) (Sept.)

V. 31. 'That is, when it is joined with virtue; or else, the older that the wicked are, the more they are to be abhorred.'

V. 32. The noblest courage is shewn in withstanding and conquering <sup>a</sup> man's own passions, and in overcoming enemies by kindness; and the most desirable authority is self-government.

V. 33. 'So that there is nothing that ought to be attributed to fortune, for all things are determined in the counsel of God, which shall come to pass.'—'Though men cast the lots into the lap of a garment, or into a hollow vessel, and thence draw them out again; yet, it is the Lord who directs entirely in what order they shall come out; and so determines the matter in doubt, according to his pleasure.' (Bp. Patrick.)—What is chance to man, is the appointment of God.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—16. True wisdom greatly consists in a practical conviction of our dependence on God, in every respect. He will assuredly be glorified in or by all his creatures. He hath formed, and he orders, everything for himself, and the display of his own glorious perfections; so that the rebels against his authority cannot finally defeat any of his purposes; for a season they dishonour his name by their sins, and refuse him their tribute of adoration and obedience; but, when they have filled up their part in his vast, his universal plan, he will make known his justice, holiness, truth, and power, by executing deserved vengeance on them. Thus while men of every character, according to their prevailing passions, and with all their sagacity, devise their own ways; the Lord, with secret but invincible energy, directs their steps in that manner which coincides with his grand designs. It is not for us to comprehend the manner of his operation, or to solve the difficulties which appear in it to our narrow minds; rather let us beseech him to direct our hearts into the fear and love of his holy name, and our feet into the paths of truth and holiness; that we may willingly glorify him on earth, and that he may be glorified in our eternal salvation. For when we habitually depend on him, to prepare our hearts, guide our tongues, and direct our steps; our words and works will be such, as we may with comfort commit unto him and his disposal, assured of all desirable success.—Humility, which is inseparable from true wisdom, renders a man suspicious of himself, and afraid of the delusions of self-flattery, where eternity is at stake; nay, in the general tenor of his conduct, the humble man is jealous of his heart, lest he should allow of any thing sinful, and not be aware of it; but his only security consists in fervent prayer to him that "weigheth the spirits," after David's example, "Search me, O Lord, and know my heart; try me, and know my thoughts: and see if there be any wicked way in me." How different is this from the conduct of those, who, fearless of being deceived, are offended by the most friendly caution, and count for an enemy every faithful reproof! Let such, however, recollect that 'every one that is proud of heart is an abomination to the Lord;' and should such vain confidence become fashionable, and vast multitudes concur in it, let it be remembered, that "though hand join in hand, they shall not be unpunished."—How evident is it, and yet how seldom considered, that "a little with righteousness is better than great revenues without right." For, however it may be with the princes of the earth, "a divine sentence is in the mouth of our almighty King; his mouth transgresseth not in judgment." "Wickedness is an abomination unto him;" for "his throne is established in righteousness." His wrath is infinitely more dreadful than any messengers of death, for man can only "kill the body; but He is able to destroy both body and soul in hell:" while his favour, and the light of his countenance, are better than life itself, and far more refreshing to the soul, than fertilizing showers to the parched fields. This is then our grand concern. Man's true wisdom consists in avoiding the wrath, and securing the favour, of Almighty God; and who can estimate how much "better it is to get wisdom than gold!" and to get understanding rather to be chosen than silver!" Yet, who can help observing, how much more men in general labour to get riches, than to get wisdom; or how much more pains they take to pacify the indignation, or obtain the patronage, of an earthly prince, or minister of state, than to flee from the wrath of God, and secure his invaluable favour! But the true believer is taught another lesson. He is conscious that he has in innumerable instances offended the Lord, and that, unless his iniquities be purged away, he must be for ever miserable: he depends for this pardon on the mercy and truth of God in Christ; but, in order to obtain an interest in that redemption, he would

Cautions against many vices; a quiet, friendly, and cheerful spirit inculcated; and several wise and pious observations concerning the conduct and events of life, 1—28.

2 A <sup>d</sup>wise servant shall have rule over a son <sup>e</sup>that make every submission, and use every means of grace; and the fear of God induces him to depart from evil, and to copy that mercy and truth on which he relies, and in all things to act with the strictest equity and integrity. And should he in this course meet with enemies and injuries, he dares not attempt to pacify the wrath, or court the favour of man, by sinful compliances; but he perseveres in endeavouring to please God, who hath all hearts in his hands, and who in this way generally influences a man's enemies to be at peace with him; of which experienced believers can often recollect many affecting instances.

V. 17—33. Nothing is more observable in Scripture, than the repeated warnings against every kind and degree of pride. This hateful vice often shews itself, by self-confidence, and a reliance on men's own wisdom, industry, or ability, for success in their selfish designs; forgetting not only that they are sinners, but that they are weak and dependent creatures. Whatever men may imagine, it is certain that this "pride goeth before destruction, and this haughty spirit before a fall;" it generally ends in confusion and disgrace in this world, and, unless abased in true repentance, it will certainly terminate in everlasting misery and contempt. Better then is it to live humbly in some obscure corner, surrounded with penury and contempt, than to share all the riches and distinctions of the sons of ambition and violence. This is the highway of holiness, in which the upright walk with God, and endeavour to depart to a still greater distance from every evil work; and in keeping this way, without deviating on either side, or turning back again into sin or the world, they preserve their souls from the destruction of the wicked. But wisdom also teaches a man to be afraid of deception in so important a concern; for the prudent Christian knoweth, "that there is a way, which seemeth right unto a man, but the end thereof are the ways of death."—We cannot please the Lord, if we act with rashness or acrimony; it is our happiness to trust him, but it is also our duty to seek wisdom from him, that we may not intermeddle with matters out of our sphere, or beyond our capacities, and may manage well those affairs which we do undertake; that we may prudently avoid giving needless offence, obviate the ill effects of such as has been given, and do our own business conscientiously, yet quietly, and in an affectionate spirit. Thus we shall find good to ourselves and do good to others. Indeed, understanding is a well-spring of life to him who hath it, and supplies inexhaustible resources of salutary cautions, for the conduct of life: whereas, all the instruction which an ungodly man can give, or will receive, is mere folly.—When the Giver of all good is pleased to bestow not only an enlightened understanding, a sound judgment, and a loving-spirit, but the faculty of speaking with energy and propriety, and winning persuasion, the possessor may hope to be very useful in diffusing heavenly knowledge and wisdom. A reputation for prudence gives additional efficacy to a man's admonitions and counsels, and the experience of his heart teaches his mouth, and adds learning to his lips. Such seasonable and useful words, meeting with a teachable disposition in those that hear them, "are pleasant as the honeycomb; being sweet to the soul, and health to the bones;" giving encouragement to the heart, and directing to the paths of truth and holiness. And surely we ought to be as strenuous in doing good, as wicked men are in doing mischief; but with what perverse diligence do many seek out occasions for slanders and strife! How do they sow the seeds of discord, and kindle the flames of hatred and revenge, by their calumnies, whisperings, and lies! How do many study to commit violence, entice others to sin, and employ the whole extent of ingenuity, to accomplish iniquity, and propagate vice and impiety! Such men live to do mischief, and to treasure up wrath; and pre-eminence in rank, or in abilities, renders them more like Satan, and exposes them to a deeper share in his condemnation; nay, the hoary head of a veteran infidel, debauchee, oppressor, or slanderer, is a tenfold stigma of reproach. But the hoary head of him who hath spent his life in doing good, and is found walking without weariness in the way of righteousness, is indeed a crown of glory. This man, though poor, and no way eminent in other respects, is more entitled to respect, veneration, and affection, than the most learned, affluent, or noble of the workers of iniquity. But when wisdom and righteousness belong to him who fills a throne or exalted station; when a king has the just ambition of copying the example of the sovereign Lord of all, by promoting the peace and happiness of mankind, and subserving the interests of true religion; when he abhors iniquity, provides for the impartial administration of justice, and takes all care and pains to promote integrity and equity among his subjects, by his example, and influence, and authority; when the favours shewn to upright counsellors, statesmen, magistrates, and ministers of religion, give countenance to piety and virtue; when his wrath is to be dreaded by none but the workers of iniquity; and when a long life hath been spent in this manner, and a king is grown hoary in the way of righteousness, a father to his people, a blessing to the church, and a common friend to mankind, then the summit of earthly honour is attained, and only the crown of glory that fadeth not away can add any thing to it. Behold, a greater than Alexander or Caesar is here! Incomparably, inconceivably greater. For, if being slow to anger, render a mean man more honourable and excellent than the mighty, and if the victory over a man's spirit be a more arduous and important achievement than the taking of a fortified city, how honourable is it for one, surrounded with every incentive and opportunity of gratifying his passions, to rule over them with steady authority, and to spend his life in glorifying God and doing good to men! It is true, that none can in these things command success: disappointment and tardy progress must be expected by those who would do good; but this is a labour which will redound to their own advantage, and be satisfying to their souls, though not successful to the extent of their wishes. And having used proper means, they may leave it with comfort: the lot is then cast; and "the whole disposal thereof is of the Lord."

NOTES.

CHAP. XVII. V. 1. (Notes, xv. 17, 18.) 'Where were many sacrifices, there were many portions given to the people, on which they feasted.' The original is "sacrifices of strife." Sacrifices offered, to furnish an occasion for strife and debate. (2 Sam. xv. 10-12. 1 Kings i. 8, 9.)

V. 2. Wisdom uniformly tends to advance, and folly to depress men, and this causes a constant fluctuation in human affairs. Indeed, the prudent and faithful servant is more valuable, and will often be more respected, than a profligate son, the scandal of the family; and his services may very properly be recompensed with some portion of the inheritance; or, he may be employed as guardian to the children, with special authority over "the son that causeth shame." In some way or other, however, he will acquire the ascendancy, and be considered more as one of the family, than the degenerate branch of it.

V. 3. Men both prove and refine the precious metals, by the furnace. Thus the Lord, by his providential dispensations, makes an experimental trial of the hearts of rational creatures: he searches out and brings to light what was before concealed; and by manifold experiments he hath shewn, that there is no dependence to be placed on any creature, left to itself. In like manner, he has shewn what desperate wickedness the human heart contains, and of what enormities it is capable when exposed to suitable temptations, and detected the hypocrisy of many who were before unsuspected. By similar means he discovers the remaining evil concealed in the heart of true believers; he evidences the reality and the power of his grace in his servants; he makes them sensible, that they need constant watchfulness and dependence, and have great reason to be humble and thankful; and thus he purifies them from pride and sin, forms them to himself a peculiar people to shew forth his praise, and prepares them for eternal glory. By these manifold trials of the heart, the Lord also discovers, and will discover to all the world, the justice and holiness, mercy, truth, and wisdom, of his final dealings with all his creatures.

V. 4. Flatterers, calumniators, and liars of various descriptions, especially false teachers, are welcome to those that are living in iniquity or hypocrisy: not only because they love their own image in them; but because they soothe their consciences, buoy up their hopes, keep them in countenance, and help them to cover their crimes, and believe their own delusions.

V. 5. (Notes, xiv. 21, 31.) Not only he that oppresseth, but he that mocketh, a poor man, or derides him for his poverty, reproacheth God: he treats his providence and his precepts with contempt, and seems to blame his distinguishing care of the poor. And every one, who rejoices when others fall into calamities, will be condemned, as guilty of detestable envy, malice, selfishness, and presumption.

V. 6. (Notes, xvi. 10, 12, 13.) A man's descendants ought to be his honour and comfort in old age. They should be educated in such a manner, as may warrant a confidence that their pious and prudent conduct will render them such; and it is their duty to consult the credit of their progenitors, as far as it can be made consistent with superior obligations. And parents should act in such a manner, that their children may be respected for their sakes, and have cause to rejoice in their relation to persons of such piety and wisdom. And thus it will be, in proportion as men attend to the dictates of heavenly wisdom.

V. 7. The wisest maxims, and the most pious remarks, when spoken by a man notorious for his vice and folly, lose their energy and grace, and are received with neglect or disdain: but it is still more inconsistent, when princes, or priests, or other eminent persons, who ought to be the guardians of truth and justice, are so base as to impose upon mankind with lying pretences, and to deceive those that rely upon their veracity.

jewel, by him to whom it is presented: and such is its power, it commonly prevails over all men, despatches all businesses, carries all causes, and, in a word, effects whatsoever a man desires.' (Bp. Patrick.) What a description of the mercenary selfishness of mankind! (Marg. Ref.)

V. 9. 'He that concealeth an offence done to him by his friend, takes the course to preserve love: but he that will be calling every little unkindness into question, and expostulates on every occasion, will be sure to lose his friends.' (Bp. Hall.)—Repeating grievances, and complaining of men's conduct to us among others, seem especially meant. (Notes, Matt. xviii. 15-17.) The word translated very friends, signifies a prince; and some give the last clause a very different turn. 'He that admonisheth the prince of his fault, maketh him his enemy.' (Notes, xvi. 28.)

V. 10. (Notes, ix. 7-9. xiii. 1. xxvi. 3. xxvii. 22.)

V. 11. Men of a turbulent intractable spirit, (the fool of the preceding verse), are ever seeking to disturb the peace of the community, and to engage in rebellion, or abet insurrections: but they generally come to an untimely end, by the hand of the executioner; and indeed they must be treated with severity. The proverb is equally applicable to the wicked, who rebel against God, and bring upon themselves his awful vengeance.

V. 12. 'He meaneth the wicked in his rage, who hath no fear of God.'—It is less dangerous to meet a fierce she-bear, when enraged by having her young ones taken from her; than to encounter a profligate and unprincipled man, when impetuously urged on by his headstrong passions, and provoked to anger by meeting with resistance or disappointment.

V. 13. (Marg. Ref.) 'The punishment of ingratitude shall not rest in a man's own person, but descend on his posterity, to all generations.' (Bp. Patrick.) This is a fair exposition of the proverb; a solemn warning against this hateful sin: but it admits of an exception, in the case of those who carefully avoid the crimes of their wicked parents or ancestors. (Notes, Ez. xviii.)

V. 14. When the bank, or dam, that confines a large weight of water, is cut, and a small opening made, the current soon forces a wider passage, and a terrible inundation follows from a small beginning. Thus, when any affront is given and anger begins to rise in the heart; if the least vent be given to it, one passionate and provoking word will bring on another: every retort will widen the breach, and increase the violence of resentment; and durable malice or bloody revenge will probably be the effect. It is therefore best to stifle passion, and not to take notice of an offence. For this strengthens the bank, and keeps in the water, without giving it the least passage. 'Therefore, ere the contention be meddled with, leave off.'

V. 15. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 16. The advantages which Providence confers are a price put into men's hands, with which to acquire wisdom: such are, a pious education, the instructions and counsels of wise and good men, the preaching of the gospel, and, above all, the written word of God. But of what use is this price to a fool, who has no heart to make use of it, who hates to be reformed, who will not read the Bible, or regard the preacher? He hates the light which condemns his wickedness; and will be condemned, because he would not profit by it.—Many explain this of a rich, foolish man. 'Of what use are riches to a fool? He has no heart, by means of them, to get wisdom.'

V. 17. 'A true friend becomes a brother in adversity. He was a friend before; this makes him a brother.' (Bp. Patrick.)—These maxims shew men their duty. No change of outward circumstances should abate our affection for our friends or relatives; we should be constant and persevering in our endeavours to do them good; regard the time of their adversity, as an opportunity of shewing disinterested love; and consider ourselves as born into the world, and preserved in life, on purpose to help them at those trying seasons when the rest of the world forsakes them.

V. 18. Though it is a man's duty to assist his friends, especially in distress; yet he should not rashly engage for them beyond his ability, to the injury of his creditors, and the ruin of himself and family. Indeed, there is great reason to suspect the reality of the friendship of those, who would draw others into unreasonable engagements; especially, when, being present, their own integrity and solvency are questioned. (Notes, vi. 1-5.)

19 He loveth transgression that loveth strife: and he that exalteth his gate seeketh destruction.

20 He that hath a froward heart findeth no good: and he that hath a perverse tongue falleth into mischief.

21 He that begetteth a fool doeth it to his sorrow: and the father of a fool hath no joy.

22 A merry heart doeth good like a medicine: but a broken spirit drieth the bones.

23 A wicked man taketh a gift out of the bosom, to pervert the ways of judgment.

V. 20. (Notes, xv. 13. 15.)

V. 21. 'Great is the care which ought to be taken in the contract of marriage, and in the education of children; for if a son prove vicious and lewd, it will be such an inexpressible grief to his father, that he will take no comfort in any thing he enjoys.' (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 22. (Note, xv. 13.) 'A joyful heart causeth good health; but a sorrowful mind drieth the bone.' (Old Trans.)

V. 23. (Note, 8.) 'No man would willingly be known to be bribed to injustice: but there are too many, who will suffer themselves to be secretly corrupted by presents, to give counsel or judgment contrary to law and equity.' (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 24. The prudent man keeps the maxims of wisdom and the oracles of God continually in view, as the rule and measure of his conduct; and thus his attention is fixed upon his path, and what relates to it. But the foolish man regards every thing more than his own duty and safety; his thoughts are roving about every vanity, even to the ends of the earth: and he acts, as a man would do, who, in a narrow way, full of pits and traps, and bordering on tremendous precipices, should be gazing at distant objects, but entirely heedless how he walked, or where he set his feet.

V. 25. Solomon 'might speak the oftener on this subject, having an example before his eyes of the great weakness of his own son, who, it is not unlikely, was a perpetual grief to him.' (Bp. Patrick.) (Note, x. 1.)

V. 26. It is very criminal for magistrates to punish those who have not offended, and to oppress and persecute their peaceable subjects: but it is also very wrong for subjects to revile their rulers, or excite insurrections against them, when administering justice impartially, merely because their decrees bear hard upon individuals.

V. 27, 28. A wise man will spare his words, if he cannot speak with a prospect of doing good: he will no more be a prodigal, than a miser, in the use of this good treasure. Especially he will be slow to speak when he is offended, or to intermeddle in matters not belonging to him, being "of a cool spirit," as the words may be rendered. This command of the tongue and temper are of so good repute, that even an ignorant man may be accounted wise, at the small expense of holding his tongue, as if he were reflecting and learning, instead of speaking to expose his own folly.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1-15. The depravity of human nature is peculiarly discovered, by the very general perversion of divine ordinances into occasions of increasing iniquity. It might have been thought that a house full of peace-offerings, would have been replete with harmony and love; and yet it was frequently full of strife and animosity. The gospel itself has often been preached out of envy and malice; divine truth has been the watchword of acrimony, abuse, and slander; the cause of God has been pleaded with cruelty and persecution; long prayers have been made the cloak of the basest injustice; and the Lord's table approached from gross ambition and avarice, to secure emoluments, or the expenses of lewdness and intemperance; or to obtain power for the purposes of faction and rebellion. But as it would be far happier to feed upon a dry morsel with quietness, than upon the richest dainties with hatred and contention: so, communion with God in secret is preferable, even to public solemnities and the professed communion of the saints, when these prove occasions of strife and contention. If we would keep a clear conscience and a quiet mind, we must shun all incitements to anger: we must suppress the rising emotions of resentment; and reject those hasty suggestions, which to the disordered mind appear pertinent and proper to be spoken, but which prove like the cutting of a bank and the letting out of water, and make way for domestic broils, implacable resentments, confusion, and every evil work. These we cannot avoid without much forbearance and prudence: we must learn to give as little offence as we consistently can in our own conduct: we must suppress our passions, when offended; and conceal, or make every candid and honest apology for, the faults of our friends toward each other. Thus he, "that covereth transgression seeketh love:" for he that repeateth all that he sees and hears, separateth nearest friends and relations, and does immense mischief, in private and public life, in the world, and even in the church. The Christian has nothing to do with the slanders of the day; or the parties, which pride, selfishness, or resentment form in the world, or in the church. He should also avoid those false teachers, who "privily bring in damnable heresies," and who may be known by their fruits, and especially in that they are approved and applauded by ungodly men, and by such professors of religion as are of dubious character. He should not regard the good things, which they mix 24 Wisdom is before him that hath understanding; but the eyes of a fool are in the ends of the earth.

25 A foolish son is a grief to his father, and bitterness to her that bare him.

26 Also to punish the just is not good, nor to strike princes for equity.

27 He that hath knowledge spareth his words: and a man of understanding is of an excellent spirit.

28 Even a fool when he holdeth his peace, is counted wise: and he that shutteth his lips is esteemed a man of understanding.

a x. 19. xv. 28. Jam. i. 19. iii. 2. * Or, a cool spirit. xvi. 32. Ec. ix. 17. Jam. iii. 18. b xv. 2. Job xiii. 5. Ec. v. 3. x. 14.

up with these poisonous ingredients, to render them more palatable; for excellent speech becometh not a fool, and must be used by him for some foolish and wicked purpose; and lying lips are not more detestable in a prince, than in a minister of religion: for as the magistrate, who "justifieth the wicked, or condemneth the just, is an abomination to the Lord;" so is that teacher, who encourageth a wicked man in impenitency, or discourageth the heart of the humble believer, by false doctrine.—The love of money has often warped the minds of judges to favour those who brought them large bribes; and wicked men, who can afford it, are ever ready to part with their beloved treasures, to purchase impunity for their crimes: thus, many called ministers "teach things which they ought not, for filthy lucre's sake;" the rich are often willing to pay well for a quietus to their conscience, and an encouragement to their presumption; and thus they wrap it up, till the day of judgment unfold and discover the infamous business. For, to the scandal of human nature, it is a general rule, (though it admits of exceptions,) that valuable gifts blind men to their interest and duty; and whithersoever they turn, they prosper. The good Lord deliver us from the love of money, which is the root of all evil, and teach us to lay up our treasure in heaven, and to set our affections on things above; for otherwise we can never be steadfast in any part of our duty. When these alluring baits are presented to us, we should remember, that the Lord our God maketh trial of our hearts, whether we will keep his commandments or not. And by various temptations, as well as afflictions, he distinguishes the hypocrite from the true Christian. May "the trial of our faith then prove to praise, and honour, and glory, at the coming of Jesus Christ."—If ingratitude to our fellow-creatures be so base, as to bring a curse on a man and his posterity, how abominable must ingratitude be to our Maker, yea, our Redeemer, the friend of sinners! How great is his forbearance towards us; and what cause have we to be humble, and thankful!—It is of great importance, that we receive instruction and take reproof, especially those of the sacred oracles, in good part. This is a test of our wisdom, and tends to exempt us from numberless sorrows and sufferings. For "a reproof entereth more into a wise man, than an hundred stripes into a fool." This is every one's own concern; for foolish and wicked men are indeed the shame and grief of their parents and relations, and the nuisance of society, being always stirring up strife or rebellion: but they prepare stripes for themselves, if not the rigorous messengers of justice, to arrest them, and lead them to ignominious death; and afterwards they have nothing to expect, but the wrath and vengeance of an offended God. But, a bear bereaved of her young is a faint emblem of the brutal ferocity of exasperated transgressors.—We cannot disdain a poor man, or a slave, without reproaching the Lord, who hath chosen the poor of this world: nay, the Lord of glory for our sakes became a poor man, and had not where to lay his head. Indeed, wisdom and integrity are far more honourable, than riches or noble descent, which only shame their worthless possessors, and render them the scandal of illustrious families: whilst wisdom ennobles and advances the meanest servant, and entitles him to respect and consideration. We should also be very watchful over our own spirits, that we do not fall into the common fault of secretly rejoicing, or openly exulting, over the calamities of other men; lest we should incur the indignation of the Lord.—In fine, we should, in every circumstance and relation of life, endeavour to act in that manner, which may be most creditable and useful to all with whom we are connected; and so to educate our children as may be most likely to render them blessed, and blessings; and this will most effectually tend to our comfort and joy in them.

V. 16-28. It can never be unreasonable to turn our meditations to Him, who is, in the highest and most important sense, a "friend who loveth at all times, and a brother who was born for adversity." His love to us lost sinners induced him to assume our nature, that he might become our brother, friend, and surety. This was the grandest display of the Divine justice, holiness, and abhorrence of iniquity, which any creature ever did, or can, behold. Nay, his becoming surety for us insolvent debtors, when he knew how dear the engagement would cost him, was perfectly consistent with it, and a most glorious display of it. For the Lord's ways and thoughts are above our's, even as the heavens are above the earth. Whenever the distressed sinner applies for salvation to the once crucified but now glorified Redeemer, he communicates to him mercy, and grace, and peace: and he is the constant and condescending friend and brother of every believer, in the lowest scenes of adversity, in the hottest fire of persecution, in the hour of death, and in the day of judgment. And it is his will, that we should be grateful to our earthly benefactors, and forgiving to our enemies; and that we should copy his example of love, in our conduct to afflicted friends and relatives, according as they need our help, and we are able to relieve or comfort them, consistently with other duties; but to avoid all rash and perilous engagements. Thus the sacred Scripture in every thing points out to us the path of safety, prudence, and duty: it is an invaluable price put into our hands, to get wisdom, and learn the way of happiness, both in this world and the next. Yet, alas! many have no heart to this wisdom.

and are thus proved more egregiously and inexcusably foolish. Indeed we might all have been much wiser than we are, if we had duly valued and improved the advantages afforded us. May the Lord give us an understanding heart, that we may lay this heavenly wisdom ever before us, for the direction of our whole conduct : and may He turn away our eyes from beholding vanity, and our imaginations and desires from roving to the ends of the earth, that we may consider and look well to our goings.—If we have trials from the misconduct of our children, we should remember, not only that they derived their evil nature from us, but perhaps also, imbibed some of their prejudices, and were encouraged in giving loose to their passions, through our examples and neglect ; and in that case, we ourselves are in some sense the causes of our own sorrow. We should, however, bear this and every other affliction with humble patience ; and watch against repining and desponding grief, which can only add to our misery, break our spirits, and dry up our bones : and we should cultivate a cheerful frame of mind, which does good as a medicine, to both soul and body. We should also study accurately our duty to all ranks of men ; what becomes every order in society, and in what true excellency consists.—We cannot leave our proper rank in the community, by emulating our superiors, in equipage, buildings, furniture, or attire, without great folly, sin, and mischief : yet on this fatal rock thousands are continually shipwrecked !—As the Lord will call the greatest monarch to account, if he oppress his meanest subject ; so will he not hold those guiltless, that speak evil of dignities, and magnify the errors of their superiors, or invent calumnies against them. A man of wisdom and piety will be sparing of his words, and not waste them to such unworthy purposes : he is of a more excellent, because of a more peaceable, spirit. Indeed, it is an invariable observation that “ he loveth transgression that loveth strife.” And even ignorant and ungodly men may justly be counted so far wise, if they hold their peace, and meddle not with things not belonging to them, and of which they are incompetent judges : but in general they are most noisy and busy, who have the least capacity to say or do any thing to the purpose ; or, “ who are wise to do evil, but to do good have no understanding.”

NOTES.

CHAP. XVIII. V. 1, 2. Some render the first verse as follows : ‘ A hare-brained man seeks to satisfy his fancy, and intermixeth himself with all things.’ And it is explained of the mischief arising from a self-conceited, innovating, intermeddling spirit in public and private life ; and in affairs both civil and religious. But I find no instance in which the word rendered separated has this meaning ; and the contrast between the characters described in the two verses, seems to require a different interpretation. The verse may be thus translated :—“ According to desire, he that is separated seeketh ; and he engages in all concerns.” Whatever a man earnestly desires, he seeks after, and secludes himself from other avocations, that he may not be interrupted in the diligent pursuit of it. Thus it is in all kinds of business or learning ; none excel but those who desire to excel, and who separate themselves that they may have leisure to pursue their favourite object, whether more or less valuable ; and even mischievous designs are formed, matured, and rendered successful in the same manner. The word translated wisdom, in our version, in some places seems to have that meaning ; (ii. 7. iii. 21.) In one place it is translated the thing as it is. (Job xxvi. 3.) and there it signifies satisfactory knowledge of the subject in debate. And as knowledge is spoken of in the subsequent maxim, it seems to be here intended ; and the meaning conveyed by our translation is preferable.—‘ He that loveth wisdom, will separate himself from all impediments, and give himself wholly to seek it.’—A man has a strong desire to be wise, and this induces him to avoid vain company, diversions, trifling studies, and needless engagements, that he may have leisure and retirement to examine things to the bottom. But trifling and vain men have no delight in knowledge, except to make ostentation of among such as are more ignorant and empty than themselves ; a superficial smattering suffices for this purpose, and the way in which they seek and use their scanty stock discovers the vanity of their hearts, as well as the poverty of their minds, whilst they shew away, to make every body admire them as wits or oracles.

V. 3. When profane and wicked men find admission into places of public trust, societies, seminaries of learning, or company, they soon betray their contempt of every thing good, and treat others with ignominious reproaches ; and by their ill behaviour and wrong measures, expose themselves and those connected with them, to ridicule or reproach.

V. 4. The fountain of wisdom in the heart of a pious, well-informed, and experienced man, is like deep waters, ‘ which can never be drawn empty, but ever bring profit.’ This supplies him with inexhaustible resources for useful conversation, prudent counsels, and good instructions. These flow from him with ease, and as it were spontaneously. (like the deep and gentle stream), and do abundance of good, and are totally unlike the shallow current, whose scanty waters and noisy rapid stream, is the known emblem of the unmeaning, vociferous loquacity of a fool. (Note, xv. 22.)

V. 5. To favour the wicked, is always wrong ; but worst of all, when magistrates, from respect of persons, and contrary to justice, decide for the wicked, and against the righteous.

V. 6, 7. The proud, the passionate, and the drunken, with those that give defiance and send challenges, and many others, enter into contention as volunteers ; as do all that meddle in disputes which belong not to them. Men of this description foolishly call on others to chastise their insolence, and they commonly meet with such as answer that call. Many are thus drawn into frays and duels, which end in wounds, bruises, or death ; many incur law-suits and prosecutions ; and still more bring destruction upon their souls.

V. 8. “ The words of the tale-bearer are as flatterings, and they go down into the bowels of the belly.” (Old Trans.) This seems more literal. ‘ A whisperer of false stories makes a great shew of harmlessness, if not of love... when he backbites others ; nay, seems to do it unwillingly...and not without excuses for the persons whom he detracts ; but his words sink deep into the minds of those that hear them.’ (Bp. Patrick.)—and incurably wound the very vitals. They infuse suspicions into those to whom he speaks, which im-bitter their minds against those whom they ought to love, and give rise to contentions that ruin their peace and comfort : and they wound the reputations of those of whom he speaks ; they bereave them of their friends, and lead them into innumerable troubles and temptations. (Note, xi. 13.)

V. 9. Sloth and extravagance are nearly related, they often accompany each other ; but either of them is sufficient to bring any man to ruin.

V. 10, 11. “ The name of JEHOVAH ” denotes his perfections, as revealed in the sacred Scripture, and as harmoniously displayed, through the great Redeemer.—He who, under a consciousness of guilt, and dread of misery or enemies, believing the testimony, and embracing the promises of God, flees to take refuge under the shadow of his wings, by living faith, is “ a righteous man : ” and thenceforth, whenever guilt, or danger of whatever kind, oppresses him ; he immediately runs to the same secure abode ; and not only is preserved, but exalted. The unchangeable mercy, power, wisdom, righteousness, and faithfulness of God, are his security. His refuge is ever near, and will prove impregnable, through life, ‘ in the hour of death, and in the day of judgment ; ’ and the righteous are “ kept by the power of God, through faith, unto salvation.”—But rich men are prone to confide in their wealth, and to deem that their strong city and their high wall, to defend them from dangers and calamities. But it is so only in their own conceit ; for trouble will find entrance into their castle, death will storm and take it, and judgment will sweep it and them into final perdition. (Note, x. 15.)

V. 12. (Note, x. 33. Marg. Ref.)

V. 13. Eagerness of spirit, united with self-conceit, and affectation of appearing more penetrating than others, often betrays men into the practice of interrupting those that are speaking, and answering them before they have finished their discourse ; by which they presume to confute arguments, and contradict conclusions, which they have not heard. This is peculiarly the case with vehement controversialists. But it is a great folly, and will expose the man to deserved shame ; and will, at least, be a considerable abatement from his character, as a man of wisdom, humility, and meekness.—‘ But if it be a shame to a private person, in ordinary discourse, to “ answer a matter before he heareth it : ” much more will it be to a magistrate, if, in matters of justice and judgment, he come to a resolution, before he hath taken full cognizance of them.’ (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 14. ‘ The mind can well bear the infirmity of the body : but when the spirit is wounded, it is a thing most hard to sustain.’—Even natural courage and resolution will support a man under manifold pains and calamities, if his mind and conscience be composed: and the inward consolations of the Holy Spirit will enable a believer to bear any tedious affliction or persecution without fainting. But when the conscience is tortured with remorse and terror; when the heart is racked with furious and disappointed passions; when He, that made the soul, causes his sword to approach unto it, or even permits Satan to pour in his horrid temptations; no human fortitude can sustain the misery; even the believer, like Job, will be almost driven to madness and the borders of desperation. Nay, the incarnate Son of God, in circumstances of this kind, cried out, "My soul is exceedingly sorrowful, even unto death." And unbelievers in such a case are often driven into despair, blasphemy, and suicide.

V. 15. (Note, 1, 2.) The prudent man, fearing the misery described in the preceding verse, will seek that wisdom and knowledge which may preserve him from it.

V. 16. A man's gift 'getteth liberty to speak, and favour of them that are most in estimation.'— 'It will produce his enlargement, if he be in prison; and bring him into the favour of great men.' (Bp. Patrick).— In some cases, it may be allowable to conciliate with presents, when applying for any favour; and perhaps may here be recommended as a prudential measure; but too generally, the present is given to blind the eyes and pervert the judgment. (Marg. Ref. Note, xvii. 8.)

V. 17. Self-love imperceptibly leads men to take the best of their own characters and conduct. Without design almost, they adduce and place in a clear light what makes for them, and keep back or throw a shade over what makes against them; and they state inaccurately some circumstances, apparently trivial, yet of consequence; and thus the cause seems just, when one side of it has been pleaded. But when the other party, actuated by the same propensities, comes to search out the matter, and states it in his way, it will appear very different. Thus it often is without intentional misrepresentation on either side: but when that is taken into the account, as in most cases it ought to be, it appears evident, that no judgment can be formed, or opinion passed, upon any transaction, till the matter has been heard impartially from both parties. — This maxim is peculiarly important to judges and juries; to caution them against making up their minds, till they have heard the whole evidence on both sides.

V. 18. 'If a controversy cannot otherwise be decided, it is best to cast lots, to know whose the thing shall be.'—When causes could not satisfactorily be decided; when the parties could not be induced to refer themselves to arbiters; or when they were too powerful to be dealt with, it was customary to refer the matter to God, by casting lots attended with solemn prayer. Perhaps this would still be preferable to the perpetuating of discords and law-suits betwixt Christians, or to the embroiling of nations in bloody wars. (Note, xvi. 33.)

V. 19. It is evident by facts, that when fierce contentions are excited among brethren or near relations, their resentment becomes more implacable, and the consequences more terrible, than in quarrels amongst strangers. It is more difficult to conciliate their differences, than to take a fortified city, and their stubborn minds resist all endeavours to bend them to a cordial reconciliation, like the iron bars of a castle. The same melancholy observation holds equally true, in the case of civil wars, religious controversies and persecutions, and the dissensions in societies.

V. 20, 21. As a man should be careful what seed he sows, or what fruit-trees he plants, because such will his increase be; so, and much more, careful should men be what words they speak; as they will at length be inwardly filled with the fruit and increase of their habitual conversation. For death and life are in the power of the tongue, and the consequences, good or bad, of men's words upon the interests, peace, or souls of others, will be recompensed to themselves. They who love to speak good things shall eat good fruit; they, who love to speak lies, impiety, or iniquity, shall gather fruit accordingly; and they that love to hear themselves speak, will have cause to repent their loquacity. (Marg. Ref. and Notes on them.)

V. 22. A good wife must exclusively be meant, as alone deserving that honourable title.—‘He that is joyful with a virtuous woman in marriage is blessed of the Lord. (Notes, xix. 13, 14).’—‘He that hath married a wife, who is truly an help meet for him, hath met with an excellent blessing; and ought thankfully to acknowledge the singular favour of God, in guiding his mind to make so happy a choice.’ (Bp. Patrick.)—He that has found a prudent and suitable companion is peculiarly favoured. And his success in this most important concern, which so nearly connects with a man’s eternal interests, should not be ascribed to his own discernment, or to chance, but to the kind providence of God. And he, who desires so valuable an acquisition, should observe the directions of Scripture, and beseech God to bestow it on him.

V. 23. The poor are generally led, notwithstanding the pride of the human heart, to use the language of humble intreaty in addressing the rich, even when they meet with repeated refusals: but the rich are apt to give way to arrogance and harshness, and to answer the humble petitioner with contempt and severity. This observation respecting the effect of men's circumstances on their spirit and conduct, serves to illustrate the nature and value of poverty of spirit: it leads a man to use earnest intreaties with God; and "he, who is rich in mercy," will not continue to answer the humble supplicant roughly. (Notes, Matt. v. 3. xv 21—28.)

V. 24. He, that would obtain and preserve valuable friends, must cultivate a friendly disposition, and act in a faithful and beneficent manner : and the friends whom God raises up to a man, and who are attached to him for his piety and integrity, will cleave closer to him in afflictions, than his nearest relations who are not thus united. Nay, this friendship shall not be dissolved in death, but shall endure for ever.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—13. The most important difference in respect of true wisdom, originates rather from the heart than the understanding. Ungodly men, however ingenious, have no delight in the knowledge of heavenly things; and therefore they can only seek them as much as may serve the purposes of ambition or interest, and consist with the quiet enjoyment of their sins: and they are too much occupied in other pleasures and pursuits, to separate themselves; and to “cry after knowledge, and lift up the voice for understanding; to seek for her as silver and search for her as for hid treasures.” But when the heart loves wisdom, in some measure according to its worth, other objects will be disregarded or subordinated: and did we value it properly, we should all disentangle ourselves more than we do from various employments, studies, and diversions; and redeem time, for reading the Scriptures, meditation and prayer: nor should we suffer trifles and triflers to deprive us of our precious hours, whilst we are so much upon our guard against those that would rob us of our money. When the heart thus becomes a well-spring of wisdom, it soon appears in the conversation; like the flowing brook, that, with a copious and gentle current, fructifies the adjacent country. And whilst comfort and advantage accrue to others, from a man’s wise counsels, pious discourse, or conciliating proposals, his own heart will be refreshed and satisfied. How different this man’s discourse, from that of those, who foolishly suffer their “lips to enter into contention; and their mouths to form a rod for their own correction, or a snare for the destruction of their lives and souls!” But we should not only watch against the contemptuous and reproachful language of the wicked, and the cruel words of detestable tale-bearers; but even against the unseemly manner of such as, for want of a due command of themselves, attempt to answer a matter before they have had patience to hear it, and thus expose themselves to shame for their impertinence. Most of these errors and iniquities spring from pride and self-preference. Aware therefore of the odious nature and dreadful effects of this vice, which God abhors above all others, we should repress its first emotions, and mortify it by every possible means: for we are repeatedly reminded, that “before destruction the heart of a man is haughty, and before honour is humility.” Satan frequently gains advantage against good designs, through the indiscretion, or partiality, by which wicked men obtain admission into societies formed for pious purposes, and authority in conducting their affairs; “for when the wicked cometh, then cometh shame, and with ignominy reproach.” And as it is not good for magistrates to accept the person of the wicked, and to overthrow the righteous in judgment: so it is equally abominable and subversive of all good, when partiality intrudes into the concerns of religion. Yet, alas, how often is this done, through the fascinating influence of wealth, which not only seems to the vain conceit of the possessor as an impregnable fortress; but even to others, as a most important recommendation! But let us remember that “the name of the LORD is” in reality, the Christian’s “strong tower,” which will never fail him that betakes himself to it: whilst public or private calamities, perhaps death, and judgment certainly, will expose the folly of “trusting in uncertain riches, and not in the living God.”—In the common affairs of life, sloth insures indigence, nearly as much as prodigality; and let us never forget, that neglect of Christ, of the means of grace, and of the duties of a man’s station, will as certainly plunge him into destruction, as open impiety and vice.

V. 14—24. A peaceful conscience and a joyful hope enable the true Christian to bear trials and infirmities, and even to meet death, with fortitude and comfort: but “a wounded spirit, who can bear?” And it is remarkable, that more in proportion of the superior people, than of the poor, become their own murderers. But if inward anguish here be so intolerable, what will be “the worm that never dieth,” “the unquenchable fire,” “the blackness of darkness for ever!”—May the Lord give us “the heart of the prudent, that we may seek and find the knowledge of salvation, and wisely hearken to the instructions and invitations of the gracious Redeemer. He is indeed “a friend that sticketh closer than a brother,” he will never, never forsake those, who trust in and love

NOTES.

CHAP. XIX. V. 1. A poor man, who fears God, and behaves with integrity towards all men, is, in reality, more honourable, valuable, and happy, than a man destitute of wisdom and grace, who gives a loose to his tongue to speak mischievous things, however high he may be in rank or affluence.

V. 2. Ignorance and inconsideration are equally mischievous: for a mind that knows not what it ought to choose, can never do well; and if a man hastily and unadvisedly pursue an end, (which he reasonably propounds to himself,) and will not take time to deliberate; he must needs commit many errors. (Bp. Patrick.)—This maxim is peculiarly important in religious concerns; ignorance can be the parent only of superstition and enthusiasm, not of true piety; and rash, inconsiderate attempts to propagate the true gospel of Christ, generally prejudice the bulk of mankind the more against it.

V. 3. Men run themselves into difficulties and troubles by their own folly and wickedness; and then they murmur against the appointments of God. Whereas, if they had kept the plain way of duty, and not perversely turned aside into crooked paths, they would have escaped these trials. Thus sinners, instead of seeking salvation by the gospel, complain of the rigour of the law, and make excuses for their crimes and impotence, which, implicitly at least, throws the blame of their guilt and ruin upon God. 'The folly of a man maketh his way sorrowful, and in heart he blameth God.' (Sept.)

V. 4. (Note, xiv. 20.)

V. 5. (Note, xiv. 25. Marg. Ref.)

V. 6. 'A prince never wants suitors for his favour: and every one loves, or pretends to love, him whose liberality is well known.' (Bp. Patrick.) (Note, xvii. 8.)

V. 7. 'All the kindred of a poor man hate his company, as a disgrace and trouble to them; and therefore no wonder if his companions grow strange to him. He urges them with their former protestations or promises of kindness, but finds that signified nothing; and if he earnestly implore their pity, it is to no purpose.' (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 8. He that makes the study of heavenly wisdom his grand object, best consults his own good, and is the only man who can be said to love his own soul, in a rational and prudent manner; and persevering in this pursuit, he shall certainly find happiness. (Note, ii. 1-9.)

V. 9. (5.) 'He that testifies to a lie, to the perverting of justice, if the judge do not find him out, shall be punished by God; and he who whispers slanders, and kindles strife, shall perish by these wicked practices.' (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 10. Prosperity and abundance do not become foolish and wicked men: they behave themselves unseemly in circumstances which increase their insolence and presumption, and enable them to be more extensively mischievous, and in the event render them still more contemptible and miserable. Much less is it fit for men of low extraction and base spirits, to have influence over princes, or to domineer over those to whom eminent places properly belong. This is not uncommonly the folly of a weak prince, who makes some worthless minion his favourite, merely for his external embellishments, flattery, or willing subservience to his pleasures. And thus he gives himself up to be ruled by his own servant, who engrosses all authority, and serves his own selfish purposes, at the expense of both king and people; and treats with insolence the most eminent and respectable persons; till jealousies are excited, parties formed, conspiracies and insurrections resolved on, and the state is thrown into convulsions. 'No man is fit to govern another, who cannot govern himself.' (Note, xxx. 21-23.)

V. 11. 'The understanding of a man renders him slow to anger,' &c.—Wisdom induces a man to suppress resentment, and to keep a strict guard on himself under provocations. A prudent man, even when it is necessary to reprove or expostulate with the offending party, will defer it till he can do it with temper and decency, indeed it is most honourable to pass over a transgression unnoticed; and he attains the highest degree of true glory, who overlooks or forgives the most numerous and gross affronts, and persists the most steadily in endeavouring to overcome evil with good.—Let it not be overlooked, that these proverbs exactly coincide with our Lord's instructions, and those of his apostles; though men in general think that such precepts are peculiar to the New Testament.

V. 12. (Note, xvi. 14, 15. Marg. Ref.) 'The more power a man hath, the harder it is for him to govern his passions.—None find it more difficult than a king, especially in the heat of youth, to bridle his wrath. The young lion, as he is the strongest, so he is the fiercest of all others.' (Bp. Patrick.)

him: and blessed be his name for those Christian friends which he hath given us, and whose constant and faithful love, for his sake, is our chief comfort, next to communion with him, in this unkind world, where brethren are often most strange to us in our distresses. May we be such friends to others, for his sake; and may we shew our love to him by keeping his commandments, and promoting his cause, and not only by gratitude to our benefactors, but by kindness and compassion to the poorest of his people, nay, to the worst of our own enemies.—How different from this kind and gentle spirit, is that rough and disdainful language, which rich and eminent men frequently use towards their inferiors and dependents! if they were poor in spirit, and humble supplicants to the Lord for his mercy and grace, they would soon learn more gentleness and kindness to their indigent fellow-sinners, who use intreaties to them; and without poverty of spirit, they will doubtless perish everlastingly. From the same proud and selfish disposition originate contentions among the mighty, which often cannot be decided but by the blood of ten thousands of better men than themselves: and hence arise the implacable contentions in families and among brethren, which cannot be terminated by any mediation. How careful then should every one be, to shun every occasion of quarrels; and to do every thing, that may cement union and cordiality among brethren! How base are they who sow contention in families! And what fatal effects may be expected from the smallest beginnings of domestic jealousy! All this equally, nay, more emphatically, applies to the occasions and first beginnings of intestine commotions in states. Such sparks of dissension should be watched and quenched, by all who love peace, as if fire had fallen close to a heap of gunpowder. But it is most melancholy to observe that controversies among professed Christians have commonly been conducted with the most indecent acrimony; and that, frequently proportioned to the degree in which they approach to coincidence in opinion: so that, whilst they, who are agreed in all the great fundamentals of religion, dispute with virulence about some abstruse sentiment or frivolous ceremony; infidels, and those whose doctrines subvert Christianity, are often disregarded. And when the members of the same religious fraternity are betrayed into dispute, it commonly proves irreconcilable, and ends in another and so another division, almost in infinitum! In all these facts, not only the pride and folly of man, but the subtlety of Satan, may be discerned: for, love and union are the strength, the ornament, and the very criterion of Christianity: and disunion gives its enemies their most plausible arguments against it.—As a gift maketh room for a man into the presence of the great, and into high offices, which having bought, he often thinks himself authorized to sell, or to render subservient to his own ends: so, regard to a man's wealth often makes room for him into the confidence or company of Christians and ministers, who would not judge very favourably of him if he were a poor man. Thus temporal advantages are caught at; and an influence is admitted, which secretly undermines the credit and peace, and tends to disunion and scandalous contentions.—Indeed the self-flattery of the human heart cannot be traced into all its effects. None of us are entirely free from its influences: we can scarcely ever state facts, in which our own interest or reputation are concerned, without partiality; nor can we know where truth and justice lie, in contested matters, without great candour and impartiality, and patient investigation, which are peculiarly requisite to magistrates, umpires, and peace-makers. It is on this account profitable to hear what our enemies say of us, that by balancing matters betwixt their prejudice and our own partiality, we may form a better judgment of ourselves. By reference to the Lord, however, even without casting lots, we may generally avoid, or speedily extricate ourselves out of, quarrels. He causeth contentions to cease, and parteth between the mighty: and he can take the fortress, or bend the iron bars, of an offended brother's resentment. (Notes, &c. Gen. xxxii. xxxiii.)—We can never too much attend to the repeated admonitions given us, concerning the government of the tongue, and the improvement of that important talent, the gift of speech. Life and death, in every sense, both to ourselves and others, are in the power of the tongue: the beneficial or fatal effects of the tongue are incalculable.—Indeed, we should regard the will of God, and "acknowledge him in all our ways." As he hath sanctified marriage, and pronounced it honourable; the believer, who deems it not good to be alone, should seek to him for direction and blessing, that he may make such a choice as may best conduce to his present comfort and his eternal salvation: he should receive the wife whom he hath taken, as the gift of God, and love her for his sake: and if a man have obtained a pious and prudent companion, he has exceeding cause for gratitude; especially, if he be conscious that he did not seek her in the prescribed manner. The same maxim shews us, with what view young females ought to be educated, and what ought to be their ambition and aim: namely, to be such prudent and pious wives, that their husbands may 12 The 'king's wrath is as the roaring of a lion; but 'his favour is as dew upon the grass.

13 A 'foolish son is the calamity of his father; and 'the contentions of a wife are a continual dropping.

14 House and riches are 'the inheritance of fathers; and a prudent wife is from the LORD.

15 Slothfulness 'casteth into a deep sleep; and an idle soul shall suffer hunger.

16 He that 'keepeth the commandment 'keepeth his own soul; but 'he that despiseth his way shall die.

17 He 'that hath pity upon the poor 'lendeth unto the LORD; and 'that which he hath given will he pay him again.

18 'Chasten thy son while there is hope, and let not thy soul spare 'for his crying.

19 A 'man of great wrath shall suffer punishment: for if thou deliver him, yet thou must 'do it again.

20 Hear counsel, and 'receive instruction, that thou mayest 'be wise in the latter end.

21 'There are many devices in a man's heart: but 'the LORD is high, and 'he knoweth all his thoughts.

V. 13. 'Two things make a man exceeding unhappy; a dissolute son and a scolding wife. For the former breaks the heart of his father, to see him like to prove the utter destruction of the family; the other drives a man to undo his family himself, when he is no more able to live at home with her, than to dwell in a rotten and ruinous house, through the roof of which the rain drops perpetually.' (Bp. Patrick.) A wise man would take prudent measures to prevent such calamities; but he would not ruin himself and family, either because of the contentions of his wife, or the uncomfortableness of his house: but rather beg of God to give him meekness and patience to bear what he could not remedy. (Notes, xxvii. 15, 16. Marg. Ref.)

V. 14. (Notes, xii. 4. xviii. 20. xxxi. 10-31.) Splendid houses and large inheritances sometimes descend to men from their parents, without their own care or prudence, and they are often given in providence to very worthless characters. But a prudent wife is the Lord's more immediate and valuable gift to such as he favours, and contributes more to his passing through life comfortably, and at a distance from temptation, than the largest riches with a contentious or wicked woman.—'A prudent and virtuous wife is a special blessing of God's immediate choosing, and must therefore be obtained by our prayers, at the hand of the giver.' (Bp. Hall.)

V. 15. (Notes, 24. vi. 6-11. x. 4. xv. 19.)

V. 16. Without obedience to God, and to men in authority, no prudent care can be taken either of the immortal soul, or of temporal life; and the careless or obstinate transgressor must suffer the penalty of the law.

V. 17. Whatever kindness a man shews to the poor, whether by giving them money, or doing them any service, out of compassion to them, and in believing obedience, will be considered as lent to the Lord; and he will take care that it shall be repaid with large interest, in one way or other, to him or his posterity.

V. 18. 'Chasten thy son, before he hath contracted bad habits, and becomes apparently incorrigible: and do not refrain because of his cries.' Or, Do, not concur in his mischiefs: (by conniving at them,) or in his ruin.

V. 19. Some connect this verse with the preceding: if he, (that is, the child, that ought to have been corrected,) be of great wrath, he must suffer punishment; for if he be delivered at one time, it must be done again and again. Thus, if the parent spare the child when young, he may probably fall into the hands of the magistrate when grown up; perhaps come to an untimely end; or it may prove the ruin of his soul.—A very different meaning, however, has been given to the maxim: 'He whose wrath exceeds all bounds, and makes him severe beyond measure, undoes his child.' (Bp. Patrick.) This is an important hint: but it does not seem the meaning of the verse.

V. 20. (Notes, viii. 30-34. Marg. Ref.)

V. 21. 'Man's device shall not have success, except God govern it, whose purpose is unchangeable.' (Marg. Ref.)

V. 22. If a man desire to serve us, that 'desire is his kindness,' and should be accepted as such, though he have it not in his power to do any thing effectual. Thus, the widow's two mites were honoured, as the expression of her love to the house of God: Mary was commended, when she did what she could to honour Christ; and 'if there be a willing mind, it is accepted according to what a man hath.' (Marg. Ref.) By the same equitable rule, the poor man, who makes no promises, is to be preferred to those rich and powerful persons, who amuse their dependents with assurances of doing great things for them, which they never intend, or take no care, to perform. This is a very common species of lying, but no better for being fashionable in polite circles.

V. 23. Some render this maxim in a far different sense: 'The fear of the LORD tends to life: but the full,' (or self-sufficient prosperous man,) 'shall lie down in it; he shall be visited with evil.' 'He that is swollen with pride,

'nevertheless the counsel of the LORD, that shall stand.

22 The 'desire of a man is his kindness: and a poor man is better than a liar.

23 The 'fear of the LORD tendeth to life: and he that hath it 'shall abundantly be satisfied; 'he shall not be visited with evil.

24 A slothful man 'hideth his hand in his bosom, and will not so much as bring it to his mouth again.

25 'Smite a scorner, and the simple will 'beware: and 'reprove one that hath understanding, and he will understand knowledge.

26 He that 'wasteth his father, and chaseth away his mother, is 'a son that causeth shame, and bringeth reproach.

27 'Cease, my son, to hear the instruction that causeth to err from the words of knowledge.

28 'An ungodly witness 'scorneth judgment; and 'the mouth of the wicked devoureth iniquity.

29 'Judgments are prepared for scorners, and stripes for the back of fools.

and forgets God, when worldly goods flow in upon him, shall lie down at last in sorrow, and never want something to afflict him.' (Bp. Patrick.)—The original is certainly obscure to us.

V. 24. Habits of indolence so grow upon people, that they have no heart to do the most needful things for themselves; as if a man were so slothful, that he would not take his hand out of his bosom to feed himself, and should prefer the gnawings of hunger to so trivial an exertion!

V. 25. (xxi. 11.) 'The simple and ignorant learn, when they see the wicked punished.'—'Some are so bad that they must be handled with great sharpness, especially such profane men as deride admonition, and grow thereby more furious. But there are those who grow better, even by the example of severity against notorious offenders: and a third sort, who being admonished, are obedient to those who tell them of their faults.' (Melancthon in Bp. Patrick.)—In many cases the sharp rebukes, disgraceful censures, or severe punishments, inflicted on the incorrigible, are very beneficial to such as were in danger of being deluded by their mischievous principles, or seduced to imitate their bad examples; and are the means of rendering them more circumspect and prudent. (Note, ix. 7-9.)

V. 26. The debauched young man, who wastes his father's substance by his extravagance, or turns his aged mother destitute, that he may have the more to spend on his vices, or who drives her from home by his insolence and turbulence, is a scandal to his family, a nuisance to society, and will at length come to contempt and ignominy. Such monsters are there in human form, in every generation.

V. 27. 'Cease, my son, from hearkening to instruction, in order to wander from the words of knowledge.' This is the literal rendering, of which different interpretations have been given.—'My son, hearken not to instruction, but with the desire and intention to grow better by it.' But as a man cannot become wiser and better by hearkening to bad counsel and imbibing corrupt principles, the obvious meaning of our translation is at least implied; and it is of so much importance, that it should not be lightly departed from. 'In order to profit by good instructions, no longer regard such as are of a contrary nature and tendency.' As many turn away 'their ears from the truth, and are turned unto fables;' so they that would hearken to the truth must turn away their ears from lies, especially such as are most plausible and agreeable, and set off with the greatest shew of wit, genius, eloquence, and learning.—'Take heed what you hear;' and 'Take heed how you hear.' (Mark iv. 24. Luke viii. 18.) Insinuating infidels, sceptics, and ungodly men, who endeavour to argue young persons out of their religious scruples, and excite their contempt of their pious parents, or teachers, under the pretence of enlarging their minds, and freeing them from the shackles of prejudice and superstition; with all those ministers of religion, however distinguished, whose instructions are unscriptural, answer the description here given. They administer poison instead of medicine; and their books, sermons, harangues, and conversation should carefully be shunned.—'To the law and to the testimony; if they speak not according to this word, it is because there is no light in them.'

V. 28. 'A wicked witness, mocks if you tell him of law and justice, or of the judgment of God upon perjured persons.' (Bp. Patrick.) 'The mouth of the wicked' takes pleasure in iniquity, as gluttons and drunkards in delicate meats and drinks.' (Note, xv. 14.)

V. 29. This verse seems connected with the foregoing. 'But terrible punishments shall certainly be inflicted upon those that scoff at religion and conscience; nor shall other wicked men escape, who are such fools as to despise good instructions.' (Bp. Patrick.) (Note, xxvi. 3.)

prince of this world, and by whose influence ungodly men are swayed. According to the maxims of this world, "wealth procureth many friends;" numbers of mercenary men pay court to the rich and prosperous, and intreat the favour of princes and nobles, whatever be their character, and are their obedient servants for what they can get. Nay, they flatter them, and write panegyrics on their endowments and excellencies, though their folly and wickedness are conspicuous to all the world! This is especially the case, when liberality, exercised from any motive, or by any or no rule, forms a part of the character; for then it is hoped that flattery will be well rewarded; and there are but few exceptions to the general rule, that "every man is a friend to him that giveth gifts," and has good preferences to bestow. Whereas poverty exposes even wise and good men to contempt; "All the brethren of the poor do hate him;" and his relations are pained to see him enter their doors, or claim kindred to them. How much more then do they, who professed friendship to him in his prosperity, go far from him! Thus he is separated from his neighbour, and if he harass his faithless and unkind friends and relations with intreaties and expostulations, it proves to no purpose; for they are still wanting to him; and he may sink under his calamity, or seek refuge in an almshouse or a work-house. But the maxims of divine wisdom declare, that "the poor man, that walketh in his integrity, is better than he who is perverse in his lips, and is a fool;" yea, far better than those dissembling rich men, who despise and desert them. The Son of God hath shewn poverty to be most honourable, by choosing it for his own condition; and "God hath chosen the poor of this world to be rich in faith, and heirs of his kingdom." Let us then take care neither to despise those whom God honours, nor to envy or flatter those whom he abhors. If Providence have allotted to us a low condition, let us learn to be contented: and by cheerfulness, honesty, industry, frugality, and a friendly behaviour to all around us; by shewing decent respect to superiors, without paying court to them; by avoiding every improper way of mending our circumstances; and by an universal conscientiousness, endeavour to shew poverty to be respectable. And it is far more becoming the poor, and more comfortable, to bring up their families by honest labour, and with mean fare; than to place confidence in rich relations, or to intreat the favour of princes, or the friendship of those who give gifts.—Again, whilst the proud and revengeful count it their glory to resent every affront; nay, would be disgraced among those of similar principles, if they would not venture on murder, and, without regard to their most endeared connections, risk their own lives and souls, in seeking satisfaction for the most trivial injury; the word of God teaches us, that it is a proof "of a man's discretion to defer his anger; and his glory to pass over a transgression." And who does not see how much more rational and beneficial this is? How much better it suits the present state of mankind, and conduces to a man's own peace and happiness?—As the knowledge of God, and of his truth and will, are essential to our present and everlasting good; time and labour employed in searching the Scriptures, and in meditation and prayer, is more conducive to our own advantage, than it would be if we could thus gain some powerful earthly friend. This is the true wisdom, which "whosoever getteth, loveth his own soul, and he that keepeth shall find good." Thus, we may avert the wrath of our almighty King, and secure his favour: and then we need not doubt, but that he will protect us, and supply all our wants, as our all-sufficient friend and Father.—But while men neglect both the salvation of God and their own evident duty, they run into distress; and instead of condemning themselves, they charge God foolishly, and quarrel with him, as if he were the author of their sin and misery. They complain of being unfortunate, and of having bad luck and a hard lot; or they throw the blame on relations and friends; and thus in numberless ways, "their hearts fret against the Lord."—They who have inherited, or acquired houses and riches, should take care that they do not trust in them, or on the flattering and fallacious respect that is paid them. They should recollect from whom, and for what purposes, they received them; and consider how much good or harm they may do by their example and influence.—A man's greatest troubles often arise from that quarter whence he expected the greatest comfort. For an ungodly, extravagant, and disobedient son, who brings scandal upon his family, and ruin on himself; or an imprudent, unfaithful, or contentious wife; may render the most prosperous person extremely miserable. When the Lord gives one of his servants a prudent wife, she will add more to his comfort than riches could. But if, without his criminal preference of wealth or external accomplishments to piety, he should find himself mistaken in his choice; he may confidently expect wisdom to enable him to behave properly in such difficult circumstances, for comfort adequate to the affliction, and grace to extract good to his soul from it. But, though the Lord will not forsake his offending servants; yet the consciousness of having brought upon themselves the calamity by sin, will add a poignancy to it. So that the way of duty is in all things the way of peace and safety. Indeed every crooked path, every instance of falsehood and dissimulation, nay, of rashness and harshness, will certainly be awfully punished hereafter, or sharply corrected in this present world. And the more wicked men here live sumptuously and luxuriously; the more they lord it over their inferiors, or equals, or even superiors; (for "slaves have often had rule over princes,") the more dreadful misery and disgrace await them in a future state.

V. 15—29. No man can warrantably trust in the Lord who is slothful in business. "For slothfulness casteth a man into a deep sleep," and he is not aware of the event, till he feels, that hunger is the portion of the idle, both in respect of soul and body. Yet numbers shrink from labour and self-denial, hiding their hands in their bosoms, and not having resolution to bring them to their mouths, till they are reduced to the most extreme distress; and then they bitterly complain, not only of the unkindness of their friends, but of their hard lot, by which they reflect on the providence of God. But they ought to know, that man is not at all to be depended upon; and that God has not engaged to maintain the lazy and extravagant, even if they seem to be religious. For there is little evidence that a man is really religious, who will not work; or who refuses to submit to Providence, as to his condition in life. How much better for a man to "labour, working with his hands the thing that is good, that he may have to give to him that needeth!" For "he that giveth to the poor, lendeth unto the Lord, and that which he hath given will he pay him again."—But, alas, how few have got faith! And how little faith have the most! Men in general dare credit their neighbours with more pounds, than they dare trust the Lord with pence: else they would deduct more from what they spend or hoard, to put out on this unexceptionable security, and on this highest interest. Thus indeed "wealth would procure many friends," whose prayers would bring down blessings, and abound in every way to their good; and every good man would be a friend to him, who thus gave gifts. But if we have very little in our power, we may buy into these funds, as fast as the richest can do; for "the desire of a man is his kindness;" and the widow's two mites, given from proper motives, will go as far as the large donations of the wealthy.—Indeed, every advantage results from true wisdom. It teaches us to fear the Lord, which tendeth to life, to render a man inwardly satisfied, and secure that he shall not be "visited with evil;" and to trust in God and keep his commandments, and so to keep our own souls; whereas he, that despiseth his way, and cares not by what rule he walks, shall die. Let us then leave it to those ungodly men, who scorn judgment and justice, and make a scoff of the vengeance of God, to devour in luxurious living the wages of iniquity, and to treasure up wrath to themselves: "for judgments are prepared for scorners, and stripes for the back of fools;" and they are often here made examples of, that the simple may beware. Let us "hear counsel, and receive instruction, that we may be wise at our latter end:" for we have all been foolish and disobedient. Let us be glad of reproof, that we may understand knowledge; and study, with propriety, when occasion offers, to check the insolence of scorners, and prevent them from doing mischief; and to give seasonable reproof to men of understanding, that they may be stirred up to do more good. Above all, let us cease to hear those instructions, whether from the pulpit, or the press, or the stage, or in witty and admired publications, or in convivial meetings, which cause men to err from the words of knowledge. For such false witnesses are of all most dangerous: others may, by their lies and perjuries, rob us of our characters, property, or lives, but these aim at the ruin of our souls: other false witnesses perish alone, but when "the blind lead the blind, they both fall into the ditch together." We need not envy their carnal mirth or jollity, seeing the wrath of God abideth upon them; and their insolence and licentiousness in prosperity must appear unseemly in the eyes of all sober men. Should they even be favourites of earthly princes, and lord it over better men than themselves, or persecute the children of God, they will only at length sink deeper in contempt and misery. But we should still recollect our dependence on God for every thing. "There are many devices in a man's heart, but the counsel of the Lord, that shall stand." If he then be for us, who can be against us? Whom then need we fear? Or what more can we desire, but that all our devices may be directed to coincide with his holy will?—When we educate our children properly, and chasten them when young, and whilst there is hope of rendering the stubborn will submissive and patient of contradiction; and when, in obedience to God, we repress our foolish tenderness, and do not spare for their crying; we do our best to render them a comfort to us, and happy in themselves, and to preserve them from manifold perils and miseries in future life.—It is peculiarly important to govern our passions: for if men yield to evil tempers and furious wrath, they may indeed be rescued once and again; but should they persist in their contentious conduct, at length it will bring on them destruction, temporal and eternal. In short, God commands nothing but what is good for us; and forbids nothing but what is injurious: and the instructions of wisdom are, in fact, so many infallible rules of happiness.

NOTES.

CHAP. XX. V. 1. Strong drink of every kind, when improperly used, throws down the fences of reflection, fear, and shame; excites men to profane mockery of things sacred, to revile the most respectable characters, to ridicule or reproach their best friends, to commit the greatest outrages, to embroil themselves in riots and quarrels, to gratify the basest lusts, or to commit the most rash and ruinous crimes.—"Drunkenness is an enemy to wisdom, even in common things; much more in those of everlasting consequence. ... Let him, whose design it is to be wise and good, take heed of accustoming himself to excess of wine." (Bp. Patrick).—The last clause may be rendered more literally: "He that errs therein, will not be wise." As habitual drunkenness is madness and folly, so occasional and repeated falls into that hateful vice, indicate that a man will never become wise or eminent.

V. 2. "The terror of a king is as the roaring of a young lion; whosoever is angry with him sinneth against his own life."—"The word properly signifies (not to provoke, but) to be angry, which is a kind of madness; for thereby he is provoked to such fury, as is in young lions, who are fiercest of all others." (Bp. Patrick).—Thus nothing so highly provokes the King of heaven, as impiously and virulently quarrelling with his commandments, testimonies, decrees, and dispensations.

V. 3. (Note, xix. 11.) 'It is below a wise man, or one who is truly great, to scold and brawl; or if a quarrel be begun, it is no disparagement to him,

4 The 'sluggard will not plow by reason of the 'cold; 'therefore shall he beg in harvest, and have nothing.

5 'Counsel in the heart of man is like deep water; but a man of understanding will draw it out.

6 Most men will 'proclaim every one his own goodness: 'but a faithful man who can find?

7 The 'just man walketh in his integrity; 'his children are blessed after him.

8 'A king that sitteth in the throne of judgment scattereth away all evil with his eyes.

9 Who 'can say, I have made my heart clean, I am pure from my sin?

10 'Divers weights, and divers measures, 'both of them are alike 'abomination to the LORD.

11 Even 'a child is known by his doings, whether his work be pure, and whether it be right.

but the noblest thing he can do, to withdraw himself from it, and let it rest; but all fools and lewd persons love to thrust themselves into contention, and fancy, when they are engaged in strife, they are bound in honour to maintain it.' (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 4. If a husbandman, from sloth and unmanly fear of the cold, should leave his land uncultivated, he could expect nothing but want, when his neighbours were reaping their harvest: and should he beg of them, they would not be disposed to pity and relieve him. Thus they who, through sloth or impatience of difficulties, neglect favourable opportunities, either in their temporal or eternal concerns, must bear the consequences, perhaps without pity or redress, whilst the diligent are rejoicing in the fruit of their labour and self-denial.

V. 5. Designing and politic men endeavour to conceal their real purposes and intentions, that it may be as water in a deep well; yet men of sagacity and insinuation, often find means to draw the secret from them, or in some way to find them out. Many, likewise, who are capable of giving wise counsel, are so reserved or diffident, that there requires much address to draw any thing from them. But it may be done, as waters may be raised from the deep well by skill and labour, and it will well recompense those who can effect it.

V. 6. Men in general love to be thought very upright, conscientious, and generous; and they are ready to proclaim to others, how much they have done, or intend to do, for their relations, friends, or dependents; but a truly honest man, whose integrity, veracity, and fidelity may safely be depended on, is as rare as such boasters are numerous.

V. 7. "He that walketh in his integrity, is a righteous man; and blessed shall his children be after him."—"He that doeth righteousness is righteous;" he is a genuine son of Abraham, and inherits the blessing of Abraham. He is justified by faith, and shews his faith by his works. (Notes, Jam. ii.)

V. 8. "When righteous judgment is executed, there vice dares not appear."—When wise and just kings take pains to look carefully into judicial transactions, and examine for themselves how justice is administered to the people in general; there fraud and oppression will be prevented, and grievances effectually redressed, as if by their very looks. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 9. Where is the man who has a right to boast, either that he was originally free from sin, or that he is entirely pure at present, or that he hath made his own heart clean? If there be such a one, who and where is he, among the sons of fallen Adam? Men form antisciptural systems, and fall into self flattering delusions, but the omniscience of God knows nothing of such a man among all the inhabitants of the earth. (Marg. Ref.)—"Who can say, and say truly, that he hath not the least evil affection remaining within him, no unruly passion stirring in his soul; or that he is so free from sin that he needs no further purifying?" (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 10. "A stone and a stone; an ephah and an ephah." That is, one set of weights and measures to buy with, and another to sell with; some according to the standard, to produce to the officers appointed to inspect them, or to use when afraid of detection; and others, to be brought from their concealment, when the widow, the orphan, the destitute, and the dependent, who cannot, or dare not seek redress, are to be cheated and oppressed. (23. Note, xi. l. xvi. 11.) "They are unclean before the LORD, even both of them, and they also who do such things." (Septuagint.)—"Such injustice is detestable to Him beyond expression." (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 11. By observing the first actions of a child, or the conduct, contrivances, pursuits, and even diversions of a youth, a judgment may often be formed of what his character will be, when arrived at maturity; and indeed, the propensities of human nature may be learned in the same manner. If children were generally observed to be submissive, sincere, docile, gentle, and loving to each other, averse to all ill and propense to all good, the wickedness of the world might with some plausibility be exclusively ascribed to bad habits, examples, and tuition. Yet even then it would be a mystery, (which men adopting that system ought to explain), how comes it to pass, that bad habits should be so universally contracted, bad examples set, and bad instructions given. But if children are observed to be very early susceptible of violent anger, of envy, and of pride, to be humorous and deceitful, to quarrel and to tell lies, to learn bad words and evil things almost without a teacher, and to be very backward to learn what is good, and prone to rebel with pertinacity against every exertion

12 The 'hearing ear, and the seeing eye, the LORD hath made even both of them.

13 'Love not sleep, lest thou come to poverty; 'upon thine eyes, and thou shalt be satisfied with bread.

14 It is naught, 'it is naught, saith the buyer: but when he is gone his way, then he boasteth.

15 There is gold, and a multitude of rubies: 'but the lips of knowledge are a precious jewel.

16 'Take his garment that is surety for a stranger: and take a pledge of him for 'a strange woman.

17 Bread of 'deceit 'is sweet to a man; but afterwards 'his mouth shall be filled with gravel.

18 Every 'purpose is established by counsel: 'and with good advice make war.

19 He 'that goeth about as a tale-bearer revealeth secrets: therefore 'meddle not with him that 'flattereth with his lips.

of authority; in this case, we must conclude that we are born in sin, and the children of wrath. So that, they who would know what human nature is, previous to habits, examples, and tuition, should watch their children, and enquire, "whether their work be pure, and whether it be right?"—The verse may also mean, that God notices the conduct even of children, and will require an account of them, whether their work be right or not.

V. 12. "There are ears which hear not, and eyes that see not; but if a man have an hearing ear and a seeing eye, he is doubly bound to God, both for his sense, and the improvement of it." (Bp. Hall.)—"As the LORD is the fountain of all good, particularly of those excellent and useful senses, whereby the knowledge of all things is conveyed to us; so the towardly disposition, which we observe in any child, to listen to instruction, and a clear understanding to discern, and a sound judgment to resolve aright, are likewise, above all things, to be peculiarly ascribed to the Divine grace." (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 13. (Notes, 4. iv. 6—9.)

V. 14. Whilst the seller often seeks to impose on the ignorance, credulity, or necessity of his customers, by fraudulently commending or concealing the faults of his goods, or by demanding an unfair price; the buyer vilifies them far beneath his own judgment of their value; especially, if he knows that the owner must sell, he will run him down in the price, and pretend many faults in the commodity: and when by these tricks of trade he has got a good bargain, he will go and boast of it among his neighbours! But is not this to boast that he is an artful knave, who met with a man simple enough to be cheated?—As fraud makes men dispraise that to which they have a mind; so, in the other cases, out of ignorance, or out of partiality or faction, nay, sometimes out of natural disposition, men disparage what is praiseworthy, and commend that which is good for little." (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 15. Gold and precious stones were very common in the days of Solomon, who greatly enriched his people; and wisdom ought to have been equally plentiful under so wise a prince; but an understanding heart, and lips fitted to disperse knowledge, remained still precious, not only for their excellency and utility, but also for their scarceness.

V. 16. Lend that man nothing without good security, who is ready to be bound for the debts of any new acquaintance whose company entertains him; or for bad women with whom he hath formed connections; for he will surely and speedily be ruined. (Note, vi. 1—5.)—"Teach him wit, that he cast himself not rashly into danger."

V. 17. Under the term, "bread of deceit," all things obtained or enjoyed by sin may be comprised. Fraudulent gains and licentious indulgences may for the moment be pleasant; but they will soon become like gravel in the mouth, which cuts the gums, breaks the teeth, and disgusts the palate.

V. 18. Kings, and rulers of every description, should be very careful that they do not rashly or needlessly engage in war. They should advise whether the object in contest be of that importance, to warrant so destructive a manner of decision? And whether the power to be opposed be not too great for them to cope with? If they must go to war, what armies they must raise, and where, and with what funds they may pay them? What alliances they can form? By what plan they may conduct the operations of the war? &c. Till such questions are answered, it is madness to involve a nation in difficulties, from which no human wisdom may be able to extricate itself.—"Establish thy thoughts by counsel, and by counsel make war." (Old Translation.)

V. 19. (Note, xi. 13.) The tale-bearer is commonly a flatterer. Thus he insinuates himself into the favour, and pries into the secrets, of one person or family; and then he goes and tells all he knows, with a malevolent comment, in another family; accompanying his slanders of the absent with flattery of those present, and in both addressing himself to the corruptions of the human heart. Whoever ridicules or reviles the absent, and flatters those present, may safely be deemed a tale-bearer; and in the next company he will act the same part: who then would have any thing to do with so infamous a character?

V. 20. (Marg. Ref.) "The pupils of his eyes shall behold darkness." (Sept.) V. 21. Covetous men sometimes grow rich very rapidly; but they build on a rotten foundation, the fabric must soon fall, and in the mean time its tottering continually alarms them. In short, their prosperity is accompanied by the curse of God, instead of his blessing; as both they and their posterity will learn at the last.

V. 22. Men are apt to say, 'If I should tamely bear this insult, and should not shew that I have a spirit to defend or avenge myself, I shall be exposed to further and more intolerable injuries, and become a prey to ill-designing men.'—But let no pious man speak thus; let him obey, and wait on, the Lord, and he will save him from all enemies and dangers.—How exactly doth this accord with the precepts of Christ and his apostles, which many erroneously consider as peculiar to the Christian dispensation! (Marg. Ref.)

V. 23. (Note 10.) 'This is a sin so heinous, and yet so commonly practised, that it is fit to be repeated again, that it is a most wicked thing to cheat another; though it be but in a little matter.' (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 24. 'The steps of a mighty man are of the LORD; how then can a man' (a poor feeble man) 'understand his way?'—Ungodly men can proceed no further than God is pleased to permit, and can effect nothing which he cannot render subservient to his grand designs. Pious men derive all their good desires, counsels, inclinations, and strength from him. Their works are in his hands, and their designs will meet with success, and produce effects in a degree unknown to them, but known to him. How then can a man form plans, conduct operations, accomplish designs, or foresee the event, independent of the Lord? In this case he must always be in uncertainty, as to his way, and the end of it; and he will find every thing turn out contrary to his expectation, or beyond his conception; for the LORD turneth the way of the wicked upside down.'

V. 25. Tithes, firstlings, first-fruits, and other things, were by the law holy to the Lord; but many Israelites would be tempted secretly to appropriate a part of them to their own use; and thus they would be caught in a snare, and involved in guilt. In like manner, men would often vow inconsiderately, and then be tempted to make enquiry how to elude the vow, or excuse the infringing of it. This sin likewise exposed them to sharp rebukes, from which they would have been preserved, if they had previously enquired whether they could cheerfully perform their vow; or having vowed, if, depending on God, they had honestly submitted to the present loss.—'A sacrilegious man finds devices to rob God of things that are consecrated to God, and then makes vows, in hopes by them to expiate his sacrilege. (De Dieu.) A corruption which never more infested the world, than in this age, in which most men give nothing, but do all they can to take away that which their ancestors have given to the service of God, and the support of his ministers, and schools, or of the poor. By which they are guilty not only of their own destruction, but of the loss of the souls of others.' (Cartwright.)—'A man vows in his distress, to give something to God; but having obtained his desire, studies how he may be loosed from his obligations.' (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 26. The wheel, &c. (Note 8.) As the wheel crushed the sheaves, in forcing out the corn; so the impartial administration of justice crushes the wicked, and separates them from among the more virtuous members of society.

V. 27. The rational soul and conscience of man are as a lamp of God within him, which he may continually use in examining the dispositions of his own heart, and the motives of his actions, that he may become acquainted with his own character, form a proper judgment of his past conduct, and learn properly to act for the future. This candle should neither be obscured by ignorance and delusion; nor employed in conceiving, contriving, or apologizing for iniquity. Thus it is indeed extinguished or misemployed by ungodly men: but the grace of God causes the lamp to burn clearly and to better purposes. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 28. 'The strongest guards for the preservation of a prince's person, and for the security of his government, are bounty and clemency, joined to justice and faithfulness to his word.' (Bp. Patrick.)—Let kings imitate the King of kings, exercising justice, truth, and mercy, "in all wisdom and prudence;" especially let them delight in mercy: and this will establish their thrones, (in the affections of their people, and by the peculiar blessing of God,) more firmly than either mercenary armies, or mercenary courtiers, can do.

V. 29. Young men are distinguished by vigour and courage, and are apt to glory in them, even when made a bad use of; and old men grow infirm and lose their comeliness, so that their grey hairs, an emblem of experience and discretion, are their chief ornament. But when the young spend their vigour to good purpose, it is really an honour to them: and when the old are wise, and devise and direct useful measures for the good of their families, the church, or the community; their grey hairs are really an ornament, and they have an amiableness which far exceeds all the fire and activity of youth.

V. 30. 'The livid colour of a wound is a purification for a wicked man: and stripes, for the inward parts of the belly.'—'Though stripes chiefly affect the body; yet they have likewise an effect upon the inward recesses of the mind, restraining the offender by the fear of punishment.'—'That this is the meaning of the words,' (rendered "the inward parts of the belly") 'appears from that elegant comparison of the conscience or spirit of a man (27) to a light within him, searching out and discovering his inmost thoughts.' (Grey.) —Sharp punishments, by which the offender is scourged, till livid tumours remain, are necessary in many cases, and sometimes effectual, where all other remedies fail.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1-16. If it were not notoriously evident, it could scarcely be credited, that men of the most brilliant capacities and accomplishments, as well as the ignorant and rude multitude, should be capable of rendering themselves fools and madmen, merely for the sake of the pleasant flavour, or transient exhilaration, of wine and strong drink! But fallen man, having lost his original happiness in the fruition of God, and not finding the vacancy filled by a moderate use of the creatures, foolishly seeks for satisfaction in intemperance, and proceeds to an excess in animal indulgences, to which none of the brutes can habitually be induced. Excess of wine, however, not only deludes the expectations of its votaries, and yields far more anguish than satisfaction; but it leads to scenes of impiety and iniquity; to outrageous passion, discord, and bloodshed; and to various most perilous and disastrous situations. It is not only a base and worse than beastly vice; but it runs a man directly into the snare of the devil, to be, for the season, blinded and employed at his pleasure. Whosoever then is once deceived by this sin, is, in that instance, a fool: what then are they, who for many years together experience its painful and ruinous effects, and yet run themselves continually into the same fatal snare? In every station of society this vice is pernicious: but it is most terrible in those possessed of authority. How tremendous is it, when a monarch, (who is the absolute arbiter of life and death to his subjects, and whose frown terrifieth like the roaring of a lion,) inflames his passions and clouds his judgment by inebriation! In such a case, who can be safe? Whoever provoketh him, sinneth against his own life: but who can be secure against provoking a tyrant intoxicated with pride; with exaltation, and with excess? Yet to such abuses is power liable, as exercised by sinful men! We may then heartily wish, that JEHOVAH, whose infinite wisdom and holiness secure the beneficent use of his authority, may be the only absolute sovereign: and that all subordinate rulers may be restricted by prudent limitations; that they may have power to do good, but not evil, to be a terror to evil doers, and to scatter and crush them, but not to terrify or oppress those who do well. Authority, directed by law, and exercised in wisdom, is honourable to them, and beneficial to the community. Thus seated in the throne of judgment, and shewing a decided abhorrence of impiety and iniquity; they detect and frown upon the wicked, drive them from their presence, and exclude them from those important offices, which should be filled with such, as, by their example, influence, and use of their authority, promote piety and righteousness.—No confidence can be placed in ungodly men: they are indeed ready enough to proclaim their own goodness, and to make vast professions of their zeal, and readiness to venture or expend, in the cause of those whom they favour: but a faithful man, who can find? Numbers flatter the very persons whom they ridicule and revile in the next company into which they go! And especially the divers weights and measures, and the false balances, which the Lord seeth and abhorreth; and the innumerable falsehoods and cheating tricks in bargains, which are often gloried in, shew how deceitful and faithless selfish man is. But the Lord our King beholdeth, and is displeased; and whoso provoketh him to anger, sinneth against his own soul. He will scatter and crush the wicked, and drive them from his presence into everlasting punishment. And, though none can say, "I have made my heart clean, I am pure from my sin:" yet every believer is so far made pure by divine grace, that he walks in his integrity, rendering to God and to every man his due, to the best of his ability. And this conscientious adherence to equity proves the best method of rendering his children blessed after him.—Regard to the word of God keeps a man from various other sources of mischief. The pious man will count it his honour to cease from strife, and follow after peace: "but every fool will be meddling to his ruin or vexation." He will labour and endure hardship in this seed-time for eternity, and likewise be diligent in proper measure about his secular business: he will watch against the love of sleep and indulgence; he will fear that poverty which comes through negligence; he will keep far from those ruinous connections, which reduce the spendthrift to beggary; and improve the advantages, and guard against the temptations, of his situation and relations in life.—Wherever we turn our eyes, we discover conclusive proofs of human depravity. Even in accurately considering our children, while we may discern a vast difference in their tempers, endowments, and pursuits; we cannot but also lament the tendency to evil, in various directions, which every one of them manifests. But "every good and every perfect gift is from above:" and as the Lord gave them, as well as us, their senses and faculties, we should pray without ceasing, that he would bestow on them that special grace, by which they will be inclined and enabled to use his other gifts in a proper manner. Our thankful praises also are his due, if he hath, either in our own case or theirs, opened the eye, the ear, the understanding, and the heart, to the perception of his glory, in the person and salvation of Christ. We should desire for them, (as well as ourselves,) the lips of knowledge, far more than gold and a multitude of jewels: that they may both be enabled "from the good treasure in their own hearts to bring forth good things," for the benefit of all around them; and also understanding and address to draw forth from the hearts of other men, that useful instruction, which diffidence and timidity would have concealed. Finally, he who would know mankind, and discern the characters and purposes of those with whom he has to do, must first study his own heart: for self-knowledge, experience, and acquaintance with the word of God, confer the deepest discernment in this respect, and is the most capable of improvement to valuable purposes.

V. 17-30. The true interest of princes, is the same as that of their subjects: for wisdom, justice, truth, and mercy, securely uphold their thrones; whilst the tyrant continually feels that his totters under him. The regular and impartial administration of justice, a strict adherence to every engagement, and a delight in acts of clemency and mercy, as far as can consist with the vigour of good government, procure a monarch the love of his people; which is a surer protection than ten thousands of mercenary guards; who, by hope of better pay, may be induced to murder those whom they were hired to protect. The evasion, and equivocation, which men use with their consciences, respecting that part of their substance, which by precept, or by vow, belongs to the Lord or to the poor, but which is otherwise consumed; and the great ingenuity and care with which they find excuses for the neglect of their evident duty; shew the deceitfulness and desperate wickedness of the human heart. It is thus, that they who will be rich fall into temptations and snares, and into divers foolish and hurtful lusts, which drown them in destruction and perdition. Such bread of deceit may be sweet to a man, and he may be greatly pleased with his unlawful gain or forbidden indulgences: but afterwards his mouth will be filled with gravel, and the anguish of his punishment will far exceed his momentary satisfaction. Thus estates are often gotten in a very rapid manner; and the successful cheat or plunderer thinks himself, and is thought by the foolish, very fortunate. But a wise man sees that a secret curse entwines round such prosperity, and will never permit either the owner or his family, to enjoy it with durable comfort.—Scriptural meekness, instead of exposing a man to insults, puts him under the protection of the Almighty. Pride and resentment indeed dispose men to say, "I will recompense evil:" and every fool will engage in quarrels, to his own vexation or destruction. But the pious Christian conquers his passions, and avoids or ceases from strife, and when injured or endangered, he waits upon the Lord, and spreads his case before him, and is preserved.—When the conscience, that candle of the Lord, is enlightened according to the sacred word; a man by it daily searches the inward recesses of his imagination and affections, and is employed in regulating his whole temper and conduct according to it. Thus he learns that his goings are of the Lord, and that his way leadeth to eternal life. At the same time he is taught to shun both flatterers and slanderers; and those who revile, insult, and curse their parents, whom they are bound by every obligation to love, honour, and comfort to the utmost of their power. Nothing but misery and ruin can await such monsters in human form; and if severe afflictions and distresses do not bring them to deep repentance; their lamp will shortly be put out in obscure darkness.—But when the active vigour of youth is employed to useful purposes, it is indeed beautiful and honourable: and if pious and prudent young persons live to be old, they may hope, when no longer able to endure bodily labour, to become capable of advising and encouraging others, in the most important undertakings; and then their grey hairs will be more ornamental, than even their youthful comeliness and agility were. For every purpose is established by counsel, and even war is rendered successful by good advice, even more than by valour. But it must be said to great numbers, "Awake, thou that sleepest, and arise from the dead, and Christ shall give thee light." They are still in love with the sleep of sin, and shut their eyes on the brink of ruin: nay, they are making war against God, by their impiety, and reproaches and persecutions of his people: and what can be expected in so ill-advised a contest? But let us make war against the world, sin, and Satan; let us do it with good advice, counting our cost, and forming an alliance with the Lord, whose power alone can render us victorious: let us enlist under the Captain of the Lord's host, and put on his whole armour; let us implicitly obey his orders and follow his steps: let us neither make peace or truce with our foes, nor give them any quarter: if we be wounded, or baffled in any conflict, let us apply for help to the Lord, and renew the battle with increased watchfulness and vigour: and let us still wait on him, and he will save us, and at length make us more than conquerors, and give us the crown of glory.

NOTES.

CHAP. XXI. V. 1. The Lord formed, and regulates, the courses of rivers as he pleases: yet the water runs according to its own nature, without any force put upon it. Thus he influences the thoughts and determinations of the human mind, to suit his own wisdom and holy purposes, without interfering with the exercise of our natural powers, as rational and accountable agents; and the hearts of the mightiest or most absolute monarchs are as much under his control, as that of the meanest person. 'Their wills are subject to the great Lord of all, who diverts them as easily from what they intend, or inclines them to that which they resolve against, as the gardener draws the water through the trenches he cuts, to water what part of the ground he thinks good.' (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 2. (Note, xvi. 2.)—'For the weightiness, I suppose, of the matter, and the proneness of men to flatter themselves, and not to judge sincerely of their own actions; this is here again repeated.' (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 3. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 4. "A haughty look, and a proud heart, which is the light of the wicked," (that is, the thing whereby he is guided,) "is sin." (Old Trans.)—The word rendered plowing more frequently signifies a lamp, or light; and it is difficult to determine in which sense it is here used.—'A lofty look and a proud heart generally go together; (that is, the countenance shews the disposition of the mind.)' "The lamp of the wicked is sin." "The lamp signifies that which men make the rule or guide of their actions. In this sense the law of the Lord is the lamp of the righteous: but the lamp of the wicked is sin." (Grey.)—'The sentence may be inverted in this manner, "Sin is the pride, the ambition, the glory, and joy, (or the business,) of wicked men." That upon which they value themselves, and for which they think themselves brave fellows, is, that they dare do wickedly.' (Bp. Patrick.)—But our translation of this clause admits of an important meaning. The ungodly man does not perform a single action, because it is the will of God, out of submission to his authority, or from a desire to glorify him; and therefore even the plowing of his ground, in order to grow rich, and to have what he may spend upon his lusts, is sinful as to its motive and object, and the spirit in which he does it.

V. 5. They who are steadily diligent, employ foresight and contrivance, as well as labour, in order to provide for what they may want hereafter; and generally are prosperous. But if a man use some industry, yet do not consider how to conduct his affairs, but goes about his work hastily, or engages in rash projects, or undertakes more than he is capable of managing, as unduly eager after the world, and in haste to be rich; he acts, as if his thoughts were employed in devising how to reduce himself to poverty.

V. 6. Schemes of growing rich, speedily and easily, by fraud and imposition in trade, or by lies, perjuries, or flattery, are learned by wicked men from each other, and are handed about as great mysteries and valuable discoveries. But they are vain and foolish projects; wealth thus gotten is vanity and vexation; and they who get it, act as if intentionally seeking for death and perdition.

V. 7. Destroy; or terrify. 'He meaneth this chiefly of judges and princes, which leave that vocation unto which God hath called them, and powl;' (or exact from,) 'their subjects, to maintain their lusts.' (Notes, Is. i. 23. Jer. v. 28-30.)

V. 8. The various paths of ungodliness and iniquity, into which men turn aside, are so many proofs of the frowardness and rebellion of the human heart; and of the blindness and folly of the human understanding, which are strange and surprising. But the few, who by divine grace are true in heart, will shew it, by their works being right, i. e., according to the straight rule of God's word.—The words are also capable of this meaning: 'As a man is, so are his works: a man of tricks will act strangely, (quite different from all that whereby we ought to govern ourselves;) but an honest man you may know where to have; for he acts conformable to the laws of righteousness.' (Bp. Patrick.) The honest man, in this paraphrase, must mean a truly pious person, as distinguished from all ungodly men: and thus the interpretation comes nearly to the same thing.

V. 9. (Note, xix. 13.) The most solitary, inconvenient, and exposed dwelling, is preferable to a large and commodious house, and a great family, where the comforts of social life are imbittered by contention; especially the contention of a passionate and clamorous wife. Such maxims are especially intended to caution men, in respect of the choice they make in this important matter; and not for lucre of money, or other worldly motives, to risk such a calamity as no wealth can counterbalance.

V. 10. The selfish desires of a wicked man's heart necessarily lead to baseness in his conduct. He is intent upon gratifying his avarice, ambition, lust, or revenge; and the reputation, interest, peace, connections, nay, the life or soul, of his neighbour, seem to him but secondary considerations; he is therefore ready to seduce, defraud, libel, oppress, or even rob and murder, when he can do it with impunity, and render it subservient to his purposes. No one can be safe who stands in his way: for he loves his lusts better than either friend or brother; so that none must expect to find favour in his eyes, when they interfere with his vile pursuits.

V. 11. (Note, xix. 25.) This verse may mean, that the simple, (or such as are incautious, inexperienced, and liable to be deluded by profane scoffers, and not avowed and hardened in vice and impiety,) will not only be taught wisdom by the punishment of the wicked, but also by observing how wise men profit by instruction.—'When the scorner is punished, the simple is made wise: and when the wise is instructed, he' (the simple,) 'receiveth knowledge.' He profits by the example of the scorner's punishment, and by that of the wise man's teachableness,—or prosperity, for so the word may signify.

V. 12. Some explain this verse to mean, that righteous magistrates carefully search the houses of wicked men, to detect their crimes, that they may punish them. As we read it, the meaning is, that the righteous make a proper estimate of the prosperity of ungodly men, knowing that God will speedily overthrow them for their wickedness.

V. 13. They who oppress the poor, by beating down their wages till they cannot earn the necessities of life, and then refuse to hear their complaints: and they who will not relieve, according to their ability, those who cry unto them in distress; and such magistrates as neglect to do the poor justice against their rich oppressors, "evidently stop their ears at the cry of the poor." The number of beggars in our streets, many of whom are poor through idleness and drunkenness, or mere impostors in their apparent distress, and who spend all they can extort by pathetic cries, upon their vicious indulgences; render an apparent stopping of the ears at the cry of the poor, absolutely unavoidable. Certainly they who are known to be honest and industrious, and in real distress, have by far a preferable claim to assistance: few are able to contribute to both classes, and doubtless discretion should direct the exercise of charity; for every shilling a man can spare is so much committed to him, to be made the best use of that he can.—But he, who selfishly and unfeelingly disregards the sufferings of the poor, in general, without contributing his portion to relieve them, may now mock God with hypocritical prayers, but he will not be heard; and he may at length cry for a drop of water to cool his tongue, and not obtain even that small alleviation of his misery: "For he shall have judgment without mercy, who hath shewed no mercy." (Marg. Ref.)

V. 14. (Note, xvii. 8. xviii. 16. xix. 6.) Presents, conferred to induce men to deviate from impartial justice and sincerity, must always be abominable: but a gift made to one, who hath taken offence and is greatly exasperated, may be a proper, and an effectual, means of subduing his resentment and preventing discord; as it may appear a testimony of respect, and dispose him to conclude that the offence was not intended, or that the giver is sensible of his fault. But when it must be the gift of something which is known to be acceptable, and it must be presented with prudence and secrecy, as conceding the superiority, and not as making an ostentation of generosity.

V. 15. The righteous delight in justice and equity; good magistrates take pleasure in the conscientious discharge of their important duties; and good members of the community rejoice when justice is impartially executed: but the workers of iniquity are alarmed at such proceedings, as tend to the destruction which awaits their evil deeds.

V. 16. 'He that will not live by those wise laws, which God hath prescribed him, but follows the conduct of his own foolish lusts and passions, shall be sent down to hell, and there confined to the company of the old giants, who giving themselves over to debauched courses, were swept away with a deluge." (Bp. Patrick.) (Notes, ii. 18. ix. 18.)—Apostates seem especially intended. (Ps. cxv. 5.)

V. 17. Addictedness to carnal mirth and sensual indulgence is inconsistent with a man's interest, both here and hereafter.

V. 18. The Lord ransoms his people from calamities, by punishing the wicked. He ransomed Israel by desolating Egypt; he slew Sennacherib's army, to ransom Hezekiah and Jerusalem; in short, he so values the righteous, that when their welfare requires it, he gives up any number of the wicked to destruction.—'God shall cause that to fall on the head of the wicked, which they intended for the just; by delivering the just, and putting the wicked in their places.'

V. 19. (Note 9.) 'I had rather dwell with a lion or a dragon, than to keep house with a wicked woman.' (Ecclesiasticus.)

V. 20. That plenty, which is obtained by prudence, industry, and frugality, is a most desirable treasure: and it may generally be found in the homely dwellings of the wise and righteous. But the extravagant and self-indulgent spend even their ample revenues in debauchery and excess, and thus run in debt, and involve themselves in extreme difficulties. (Note, 17.)—Oil was a chief production of Canaan, and seems to be put for all things needful and comfortable.

V. 21. 'He that greedily lays hold on all occasions to exercise justice and mercy, shall lead a most happy life;—and be highly esteemed, honoured, and praised.' (Bp. Patrick.)—The marginal references shew that infinitely greater blessings are included, though these are not excluded.

V. 22. Wisdom is more efficacious than force. A wise man, by ingenuity, prudence, circumspection, and perseverance, will surmount the greatest difficulties, even those which resemble "the scaling of the city of the mighty, and the casting down of the strength of the confidence thereof." (Marg. Ref.)

V. 23. (Note xiii. 3.)

V. 24. 'A proud and haughty person, who may well be called a scorner, proceeds furiously and unreasonably in all that he doeth. He is puffed up with a great conceit of himself; he regards neither God nor man; he cannot endure the least opposition; but being enraged with insolent fierceness, he proceeds against those who cross his designs.' (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 25. The unsatisfied desires of the slothful wear him out: or, "refusing to labour," he is tempted to plunder, and so comes to an untimely end. 'He thinketh to live by wishing and desiring all things; but will take no pains to get ought.'

V. 26. Some make this a distinct maxim. 'The unrighteous lusteth all the day after evil things: but the righteous pitieth, and shews compassion without sparing.' (Marg. Ref.)

V. 28. (Note, xix. 9.)—He that testifies only to what he himself hath heard, or is fully acquainted with, will persevere in his testimony, and gain more and more credit; even if at first neglected.

V. 29. 'A man resolutely wicked endeavours to grow so impudent, that he may not blush at what he doeth; nor be moved in the least at any man's admonitions or reproofs: but a man sincerely virtuous, examines and censures his own actions if they be amiss; and makes it all his care so to live that he may not be ashamed of what he doeth.' (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 30. Whatever appears to be wisdom, understanding, or counsel, but is employed in forwarding sinful projects, will in the end appear to have been madness and folly: and those plans, which have been laid with the most consummate policy, and are conducted with the utmost discretion, cannot but be frustrated, when they run counter to the purposes of God.—'They all signify nothing, if they oppose the counsels and decrees of heaven.' (Bp. Patrick.)

4 By humility, and the fear of the LORD, are riches, honour, and life.

5 Thorns and snares are in the way of the froward: he that doth keep his soul shall be far from them.

V. 31. Warlike preparations, however formidable, (of which the horse seems here to be mentioned as the chief,) are no more effectual against God's purposes, than wisdom and counsel. The security and salvation of those whom he favours are effected without them; and the destruction of his enemies cannot by them be prevented.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—16. As we are extremely prone to confide in second causes, or to perplex ourselves about them, we need repeated admonitions, that God is the great first cause of all. Faith rests on this truth: and the believer, in proportion to his faith, perceiving that the Lord rules every heart, seeks to have his own heart directed in his fear and love; and then relies on him to restrain, incline, or change the hearts of others, as may best prevent their injuring him, or dispose them to help and favour him. Should then some potentate menace vengeance against him; instead of seeking to appease his wrath by sinful compliances, he will make "the name of the Lord his strong tower," and by fervent prayer seek to him to dispose the prince's heart to lenity. (Notes, Gen. xxxii. xxxiii.) On the other hand, should he need the countenance and assistance of the king or his nobles, he would make his first application to Him who hath their hearts in his hand. (Notes, Neh. i.) And this carries him through the greatest difficulties and improbabilities. For prayer can unlock all gates, divide rivers and seas, and even remove mountains; when it engages the arm of the Almighty to support the cause or succeed the measures of his servants. If we then profess to be of that favoured company, we ought most of all to fear, "lest our way should be right in our own eyes," but wrong in his sight, "who pondereth the hearts." Here is the preciousness of true knowledge: for "the man that wandereth out of the way of understanding," and remains in ignorance or embraces error, because he hateth the truth and loveth sin, "must remain in the congregation of the dead." Through ignorance and error, poor wretched sinners are rendered arrogant and vain-glorious: and their high looks and proud hearts are their sin and condemnation: and while they glory in the management or success of their temporal concerns; they seldom consider, that the covetous, ambitious, or sensual motives, by which they are actuated, render the employments, which are most lawful in themselves, acts of selfishness and disobedience, as performed by them. To do justice and judgment are more acceptable to the Lord, than any sacrifices we can offer; though it doth not supersede the necessity of the Redeemer's sacrifice of inestimable value, or of our entire dependence on it.—He, who is taught according to the word of God, will escape many ruinous extremes. He will not desire those riches which are got by lies or robbery: for however ungodly men toss this vanity to and fro, and please themselves with it; yet, he knows that in so doing they seek death; and that destruction will be to the workers of iniquity, who refuse to do judgment. He wisely considers the splendid houses of prosperous sinners; and foreseeing their overthrow, he desires and envies nothing that they possess. And he had rather deny his vanity an useless ornament, or his appetite an injurious or needless gratification, or even be censured for not treating his rich friends according to their expectation, than be condemned for stopping his ears at the cry of the poor: and as he cries and hopes for mercy from God, he dares not embezzle, or waste, that which was entrusted to him for the relief of such as are distressed; lest he should call for mercy from God, and not be heard. The judicious Christian will also avoid all those hasty schemes, by which many ruin themselves. He will study by frugality and industry to keep out of temptation to mean dependence or shuffling dishonesty; and he will be ready to labour, that he may have to give to him that needeth. But after every warning, wicked men sin on without fear or shame, getting all they can by their injustice, and spending it upon their lusts; and shewing no mercy or favour to their neighbours, because of the evil which their souls desire. So froward and strange is the way of man, as left to himself! so different from that of "the pure, whose work is right!" Hence it is, that while the righteous delight in justice and mercy; the workers of iniquity are not only determined to go on in the way of destruction, but shew scorn and enmity against those, who "run not with them to the same excess of riot" and impiety! Nay, their anger and hatred are often more vehement against those who testify of them that their works are evil, than against such as behave most injuriously and deceitfully towards them: so that, while in the latter case, a few well-timed and acceptable gifts will pacify their strongest wrath; in the latter, the most persevering, disinterested, and liberal kindness are insufficient to conciliate them! When sinners arrive at this pitch of hardened impiety; it seems almost desirable, though awful in itself, that some punishment may overtake them, which may make the simple wise enough to shun their destructive paths, to imitate the wise who hearken to instruction, and to escape the miseries which scorners must undergo; and thus become happy in themselves, and blessings in the families to which they belong; and, instead of driving their nearest relatives into retirement, or into bad company to escape contention, make numbers ready to say, "Happy are" even "thy servants which stand continually before thee, and hear thy wisdom," share thy amiable society and kindness, and witness thy edifying example.

V. 17—31. He that has a well-grounded assurance that God is on his side, needs not fear what man can do to him, for there is no wisdom, nor understanding, nor counsel, "against the LORD;" nor can any power reach those whom he protects. And, though "the horse may be prepared against the day of battle," and various means may be used to secure our persons and habitations, yet safety is only from the LORD. But in vain do men expect to please a holy and omniscient God by such formal services, as the unconverted, while persisting in their evil courses, can present; even when they offer them in a kind of ignorant sincerity. How greatly then must he abhor the most costly oblations, or abundant devotions, of those who are consciously hypocrites, and who employ these methods with a most wicked mind, to mask their covetousness, oppression, or secret licentiousness, and to blind the eyes of their fellow-creatures.—True repentance, and reliance on the mercy of God in Christ Jesus, always influence men to follow after righteousness and mercy in their own conduct. Such believers, and such only, "find life, righteousness, and honour." "They seek first the kingdom of God and his righteousness; and all other things are added to them."—Thus they generally partake of the desirable treasures found in the dwellings of the wise, which they obtain with credit and a good conscience, enjoy with gratitude, and use to the best of purposes. To this plenteousness, their thoughts as well as labours tend. They desire, in submission to providence, to have things needful and comfortable for themselves and families, and to be enabled to use hospitality without grudging. They will not therefore spend all for themselves, as foolish men do, being aware that they who love pleasure and indulge their appetites, will always be too poor to do much good to their indigent neighbours. Though they do not account riches worthy of being obtained by iniquity, or of being idolized, yet they consider them as too good to be wasted in revellings, banquetings, and other extravagant expenses; and though not disposed to look on honest poverty as an intolerable evil, they dread and shun the disgraceful and ruinous "desire of the slothful, whose hands refuse to labour," even when he coveteth greedily all the day long." By the due government of their appetites and passions, and by keeping their tongues, they preserve their souls from numberless troubles, to which the sensual, the passionate, and the loquacious expose themselves; and, learning wisdom from its very source, they are enabled to accomplish important designs for their own good and that of others, in a quiet and unexceptionable manner; while the "proud and haughty scorners, who deal in proud wrath," render themselves hated and dreaded; and with all their violence (even when possessed of sagacity and power) seldom prosper in their enterprises. For the great disposer of all events so orders it, that "the wicked is a ransom for the righteous, and the transgressor for the upright."—The consistent Christian is always a lover of peace; and ready to give up any thing, except his duty, for the sake of it. He will not, therefore, either in private, or in a court of justice, be a false witness; but if called to bear his testimony, he must speak constantly and declare what he knows, whatever offence it may give, or however it may tend to the condemnation of the guilty. Much more, then, must the minister of the gospel speak constantly the whole of his message, whatever ridicule, anger, and obloquy he may incur by his faithfulness, from proud and haughty scorners; for in this case especially, "a false witness shall perish;" and generally he occasions the ruin of multitudes along with him.—That state of the judgment and heart, which is produced by Christian principles, will never permit a man to risk the want or the loss of domestic peace, for the sake of acquiring an accession of wealth; knowing that it is better to dwell in a garret or a desert, than with a brawling woman in a wide house. But, should his patience be exercised by such a painful trial, he will shun imbibited contention, by retiring into any corner, or into the fields and deserts, that he may pour out his heart before God, rather than run into temptation, into vain company, excess, or the society of other women. Nay, he will not despair but that, by meekness, prudence, patience, firmness, and persevering kindness, and by constant prayer to Him who hath all hearts in his hand, the cross may at length be removed, or at least its worst effects prevented. For as every thing lawful may be rendered a part of a believer's duty, so every event may subserve to his growth in grace; whilst even the lawful and needful employments of ungodly men become their sin; and their best comforts tend to their increasing condemnation.

NOTES.

CHAP. XXII. V. 1. A reputation for wisdom, piety, and integrity, is far more valuable than great riches; and the loving-favour which it procures, renders a man more respected than wealth can do; and whilst affluence commonly tempts the possessor to give a loose to his inclinations, an established character is a perpetual restraint, and renders a man doubly watchful against every kind of impropriety. Above all, it enables him to do more good, than riches without a good name can do; it gives peculiar influence, and adds energy to all his counsels, exhortations, and measures; and it obtains him access to such opportunities of usefulness, and enables him to compass such designs, as otherwise had been impracticable. (Notes, Ec. vii. 1. x. 1.)

V. 2. The rich and poor live together on earth, and but seldom without envy and contempt, though they have mutually need of one another. They will likewise soon meet in the grave, and at the judgment-seat they will be convened before their common Maker. He hath wise reasons for making this difference in their outward station, but he will judge them without respect of persons, concerning the manner in which they have discharged their respective duties.—The wisdom of God hath not thought fit to make all men rich, or all rich only to impoverish himself.' Others will exact from him, what he hath exacted from the poor. The oppressors shall be oppressed and ruined.

V. 17. From this verse to the end of the twenty-fourth chapter, the sacred writer adopts a more connected method, and more directly addressed to the reader; not wholly unlike the introductory part of the book. This, therefore, may be considered as the third part of it. (Notes, ii. 1-9. iv. 1-9. v. 1, 2.)

V. 18. 'It will give thee most high satisfaction, if thou dost so heartily entertain them, and thoroughly digest them, and faithfully preserve them in mind; that thou art able withal to produce any of them, as there is occasion, and aptly communicate them for other men's instruction.' (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 20. (Note, viii. 6-9.) The word, rendered excellent, may signify three times, that is, many times. Have I not inculcated these things many times? But some understand it, according to another meaning of the same word, to signify 'words fit for a prince to speak, and the best men in the world to hear.'

V. 21. Send thee. Or 'are sent to thee,' to "ask a reason of the hope that is in thee;" or who otherwise request thy counsel. But the clause may mean, 'That thou mayest be capable of managing business, however difficult, to the satisfaction of those that employ thee.'—The prudent statesman, the sagacious ambassador, and the faithful minister of religion, are characters of this description, each of whom is able to answer words, even truth, (that is, to give a true and faithful account of his proceedings,) to him that commissioned him.

V. 22, 23. The rich and powerful think that they may oppress the poor and helpless with impunity, either in the ordinary intercourse of life, or in the gate, that is, when acting as magistrates. But that very poverty which encourages their oppression, should deter them from it, not only from motives of compassion, but because God himself is the patron of the poor, and will surely crush those who crush them, and that even to the life or soul of the oppressor.

V. 24, 25. 'It highly concerns us, for the preserving the peace and safety of our life, that we intermingle not our matters with men of a choleric nature, and such as easily provoke or undertake quarrels and debates. For such kind of friends will perpetually engage us in contentions and factions; so that we shall be constrained either to break off friendship, or to be wanting to our personal safety.' (Lord Bacon.)—Lawsuits, duels, and broils of every kind, destructive of comfort, dangerous to life, and wholly inconsistent with religion, are the snares to the soul of those who venture on such intimacies; and it seldom happens, that the quarrelsome humour fails of becoming contagious; so that friends of this character often murder one another.

V. 26, 27. (Note, vi. 1-5.) Solomon here adds: when a man is conscious to himself that he hath no estate, and doth but deceive him to whom he stands bound for the debt; and so, deprives him of benefit of the law, mentioned Ez. xxii. 26, 27. Deut. xxiv. 6. (Bp. Patrick.)—These laws, however, relate only to pledges, not to insolvent debtors, and least of all to fraudulent debtors. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 28. (Note, Deut. xix. 14.) This verse is generally accommodated, as a caution against 'changing the laws, which antiquity by grave authority hath delivered, unless there be an evident necessity,' and against innovations in general, which can seldom be safely made, and without urgent necessity ought never to be ventured on.—If the caution be applied to religious concerns; it must be remembered, that the religion of the Scriptures is of the most venerable antiquity; and all deviations from it, even in the first ages, were innovations. "To the law and to the testimony." If it had been proved, that an Israelite had moved an ancient landmark, and defrauded his neighbour; the law of God would not have allowed any prescription, by which the new landmark was to continue, to the injury of the honest man's posterity, and the advantage of the robbers. Much less must prescription be admitted against the doctrines, precepts, and ordinances of God. For we know who said, in this case, "Full well ye reject the commandments of God, that ye may keep your own traditions." And we know, that he and his apostles were considered, by these men, as innovators.

V. 29. The words rendered diligent in his business, implies celerity, readiness, and cheerfulness in a man's proper employment, whatever that may be. 'To which is required a quickness of apprehension, in discovering the fittest means, and of dexterity in the application of them: so that the business is not only done, but done speedily, and without much noise and bustle.—Such a person, if he can be found, is likely to come to great preferment.' (Bp. Patrick.) On this text, Lord Bacon shows, that profound men are too prying, popular men draw men's eyes too much to themselves; courageous men are apt to be turbulent; and strictly honest men too stiff, to be the most successful courtiers; but celerity in despatching business hath nothing in it that doth not please.—It is, however, of small value, without some of the other qualities. (Marg. Ref.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1-16. True wisdom greatly consists in being able to judge accurately of the comparative value of objects, which stand in competition with each other; that we may choose the more excellent, and bestow proportionable care and labour to secure them; and be willing to sacrifice the inferior to the superior interest. The salvation of our souls, a name in the book of life, and the loving-favour of the Lord, are the grand concerns of all: but a good name among men is the next most valuable possession. Indeed, that reputation which just passes current in the world, or even in the church, is of small value. The reputation, which men obtain by ingenuity, valour, learning, or illustrious actions, or by whatever merely serves to render a man popular, is so often lavished on unworthy characters, and is so ruinous to the vain-glorious idol and his besotted idolaters, that a wise man cannot desire it: nor can it be expected that the world will generally honour those whom God honours. But when a Christian, regardless of his own glory, but zealous for the honour of the gospel, is enabled to live down prejudice and calumny, and to convince opposers by an uniform course of integrity and discretion; when he so lives, that they who dislike his creed, hesitate not to rely on his veracity and fidelity, even where their interests are most deeply concerned; when he can thus extort the concession from all parties, that he is an honest and friendly man, who would do good to every one; he then has realized a treasure, compared with which gold and silver are baubles. A long life, spent in acquiring such an ascendancy over the minds and consciences of men, is by it well repaid; and the closing scene may produce effects of the most extensive benefit. But this kind of reputation is acquired with great difficulty, and it is easily forfeited; for the higher it is advanced, the more will be expected from the possessor. Nay, it may possibly admit of great abuse; and such is the inconsistency of man, that some have by a long course of good conduct acquired a deservedly high reputation, and then have strangely been induced to give currency to error with it! We should therefore not only be careful to obtain and to preserve a good name; but we should be very circumspect what use we make of that measure which we possess. — We are continually reminded, that the rich and the poor will meet together before their common Creator, as their impartial Judge. If then the rich have authority over his poor neighbour, let him use it with gentleness, and without arrogance or contempt: if he lend, or give to him, let him not attempt to domineer over him on that account, remembering that both are upon a level before the Lord. Riches and power are, as land, to be cultivated: but he who sows iniquity, will reap vanity, and be turned out of his stewardship with disgrace. They, who oppress the poor to increase their riches: yea, they who spend that in presents and entertainments for the rich, which was entrusted to them that they might feed the poor, will surely come to want, either here or hereafter. But he, whose eye is looking out continually for necessitous persons to whom he may dispense his bounty, and who gives liberally of his bread to the poor, shall abound in blessings; and the rich have the poor always with them, that whensoever they will, they may do them good, and so obtain these blessings. And let the poor remember, that the Lord made the difference betwixt their lot, and that of the rich: let them then submit to his wise and righteous will, without envy or murmurings: let them be humble, obliging, frugal, and industrious, attending to the duties of their station, and expecting the great decisive day: for, "by humility, and the fear of the Lord, are true riches, and honour, and life;" but proud, ungodly, dishonest, and licentious poverty is indeed disgraceful and ruinous. In short, "thorns, and snares are in the path of the froward," whatever be his rank in life: he must be pierced with sorrows, and entangled in temptations, from which he that keepeth his soul shall be far removed. The scorner, for instance, must be excluded from every orderly family, and all instructive company, in order that strife and contention may go out, and peace may be preserved. Thus he is driven to associate with those who are pests of society, and to sink deeper into sin and misery continually. And if he be not fit for those families, which have some feeble resemblance of the regions of peace and love, he will never find admission into heaven; but must remain in outer darkness and despair. It is indeed desirable to live, as much as may be, like the blessed company above, where strife and envy never find admission: and that our families also may be peaceful and orderly, we should very carefully train up our children in the way, in which they should go: that as they grow up, they may set an example of obedience to domestics, as well as give a hopeful prospect of living pious and useful lives. For every kind of foolishness and vice is bound up in the heart of a child, and will be unfolded by years, temptations, and opportunities: but the discreet use of the rod of correction has a powerful tendency to check its growth; and, when used in obedience to God and dependence on him, is an appointed means of driving it away: so that generally they, who are properly educated, when they grow old do not depart from the way in which they were trained up. But humoured and neglected children soon contract habits of sloth: every exertion or difficulty dismays them, as if a lion were in their path ready to devour them; and thus abject and hopeless poverty comes upon them.—Again ill-instructed youths seldom escape that deep pit, which swallows up the abhorred of the Lord. They are lazy and loitering, and come within the flattering speech of the strange woman, who decoys them into the most ruinous courses; from which, a prudent and pious education is the best preservative. The prudent man foreseeing these and similar evils, to which he or his children are exposed even in this world, will take proper precautions against them, "but the simple pass on, and are punished."—Let us then be very thankful, that the good providence of God hath preserved to us these words of knowledge, during so long a course of years; while numerous systems of vain philosophy have sunk into oblivion, and the words of more atrocious transgressors have perished; and let us seek to have our hearts purified by faith, and our words seasoned by grace; and then, whatever be our outward condition, the King of kings will be our everlasting friend.

V. 17—29. How important it is, that we bow down our ears, and apply our hearts to knowledge! For if we keep these instructions within us, they will be a source of constant pleasure to us; and we shall learn to fit them to our lips, and to speak of them with constancy to others, when we practise them ourselves. Indeed, these are excellent things in counsels and knowledge, which shew us the certainty of divine truths, and how to answer all who enquire after them, or object to them. And we should, after the example of the wise man, try every method of gaining the attention, and impressing the hearts, of others with them.—How often are we warned against oppressing the poor and needy! and after all that Christianity has effected; and all that equitable laws and impartial judges can do, in those few places where they are found; these warnings are by no means superfluous. But let it be remembered, that he who robs the poor, especially under colour of law, rouses the dormant vengeance of the righteous and merciful God, who makes their cause his own.—A great deal of the comfort, safety, and happiness of life depends on our choice of friends: we should then especially avoid the furious and contentious man, if we value our lives and souls; and such as would draw us in to engage for more than we are worth, to the defrauding of creditors, and our own utter ruin.—Habits of industry, and expert activity in business, formed in youth, when connected with integrity and propriety of conduct, are of great importance: for they do more towards a man's comfort and credit, even in this world, than large inheritances or splendid talents can do.—But, after all, this world is of little value. All other distinctions will soon be swallowed up in that grand one, which subsists betwixt those, who trust in the Lord, and those that do not. We may come short of wealth, or reputation and the friendship of great men, but the King of heaven will guard, and bless, and honour all, who trust in him; whilst he reserves the wicked to the day of judgment, to be punished. Let us then be diligent in his work; and, though we live and die among mean men, we shall at length be numbered with the princes of his people, and stand with acceptance before the King of glory.

NOTES.

CHAP. XXIII. V. 1—3. At the tables of princes and rulers, there are abundant incentives to excess; but many reasons will induce a wise man to be more abstemious there than elsewhere. Persons of inferior rank are seldom admitted to such tables, but upon particular occasions; and their behaviour will be narrowly observed, especially if they profess religion, or are public teachers. Indulgence of the appetite frequently betrays into impropriety of conduct, which excites resentment, or renders the superior less friendly. It must lessen a man's character to be delighted with an opportunity of self-indulgence: he appears to covet that abundance which he does not possess: he sanctions the excesses and carnal pleasures of ungodly men, which his example at least should protest against; and it weakens his influence, and deprives him of opportunities of usefulness, which are too valuable to be sold at so contemptible a price. A man should therefore consider diligently what and who is before him, and what consequences his conduct may produce; and if he knows himself liable to be overcome by his appetite, he should double his guard; and act as if a knife were at his throat, to give him a mortal wound if he yielded to the temptation; that is, he should dread such unseemly behaviour worse than even death. He should learn to be indifferent about deceitful meat; which promises pleasure, but produces painful effects to the health, character, interests, and conscience. 'For oft-times the rich, when they bid their inferiors to their tables, it is not for the love they bear them; but for their own secret purposes.'—The words rendered given to appetite may mean, possession of thy soul, that is 'If thou hast thy wits about thee.'

V. 4, 5. The wisdom of the world consists in labouring to be rich; and in contriving every plan, without being over scrupulous, and giving all diligence,

8 The morsel which thou hast eaten shalt thou vomit up, and lose thy sweet words.

9 Speak not in the ears of a fool: for he will despise the wisdom of thy words.

10 Remove not the old landmark; and enter not into the fields of the fatherless:

11 For their redeemer is mighty; he shall plead their cause with thee.

12 Apply thine heart unto instruction, and thine ears to the words of knowledge.

13 Withhold not correction from the child: for if thou beatest him with the rod, he shall not die.

14 Thou shalt beat him with the rod, and shalt deliver his soul from hell.

15 My son, if thine heart be wise, my heart shall rejoice, even mine.

16 Yea, my reins shall rejoice, when thy lips speak right things.

17 Let not thine heart envy sinners: but be thou in the fear of the LORD all the day long.

to get forward in this grand concern; for prodigality and other vices, inconsistent with growing rich, are considered as a man's folly. The wise man therefore not only exhorts the reader to cease from his own folly, but from his own wisdom; and not to weary himself about acquiring wealth, but to subordinate all his worldly interests and pursuits to the acquisition of wisdom and piety; and thus to lay up more certain and valuable treasures. For why should a man let his eyes and heart eagerly pursue an empty fleeting shadow; especially when substantial good is within his reach? Yet riches are such an empty, fleeting shadow, which the covetous man watches and broods over, till at length they form themselves, as it were, wings, and fly away, quite out of his reach, as the eagle flies towards heaven.

V. 6—8. Many make a shew of entertaining their acquaintance, who sordidly grudge the expense, and often betray symptoms of this penuriousness. A wise man would not be under obligations to persons of so base and insincere a character; for though their words be friendly and their entertainment good, there is no cordial welcome; and in their hearts they are best pleased with those who decline their invitations. It is enough to make a man loathe every morsel that he hath eaten at the expense of such persons, and to wish he had it again; and he cannot but be ashamed and grieved to reflect, that he wasted his sweet words in complimenting, flattering, or even thanking those who so little deserve it.—The word rendered lose, equally means corrupt; and may intimate the temptation to which the guest of a churl is exposed, of deviating from sincerity and piety in his conversation, to avoid giving offence.

V. 9. (Note ix. 7, 1.) (Marg. Ref.) This maxim implies speaking on important subjects, in the hearing of a foolish and wicked man, who will do all he can to expose it to ridicule and contempt. (Ps. xxxix. 1.)

V. 10, 11. (Notes, xxii. 22, 23, 28.) The Redeemer was the next of kin, who was authorized, and required, and even bound in interest, to see that his poor relations were not oppressed or defrauded, (Note, Lev. xxv;) and who was the avenger of blood in case they were murdered. The redeemer of orphans and widows, in this case, might be so poor and helpless, that a rich and powerful oppressor would despise and defy him: but let it be well attended to, that the almighty God is the redeemer of the fatherless, and will defend their cause against all who injure them. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 12. (Marg. Ref.)—'Do not turn over this business to another; but do it thyself, which may save the public officers the labour; nay, by making his body smart for his faults, both body and soul may be delivered from utter destruction.' (Bp. Patrick.)—The word is sheol, which doubtless means here more than the grave.

V. 13, 14. These verses may imply a caution not to correct children in an improper manner, as well as an admonition not to withhold correction from them. They, who strike children in a passion, often use improper weapons, and risk material evil consequences: and this abuse has tended to discredit wholesome and scriptural correction. But the use of the rod, though it pains the child, (and the tender parent perhaps still more,) will be sure not to kill him, and is calculated to deliver his soul from hell.

V. 15, 16. Some interpret these verses as the language of a wise and pious parent; who conscientiously corrects his child, and at the same time affectionately argues with him, and shews him, that he hath nothing in view except his good, which would give the tender parent an inexpressible satisfaction; especially if the child were not only kept from evil ways, but enabled to be useful, by pious conversation, prudence, and upright counsel, to others also. This is a very interesting and instructive application of the passage, and well worthy the attention of parents. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 17, 18. When we habitually act with an awful sense of God in our minds, as in his presence, and according to his commands, seeking to please him, and expecting help and happiness from him; then we are "in the fear of the LORD all the day long." And such persons have no need to envy prosperous sinners: for the end of their trials and of the sinner's prosperity is at hand; and the believer's expectation shall not be cut off, or perish in disappointment. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 19. Way. 'In the observation of God's commandments.'

19 Hear thou, my son, and be wise, <sup>a</sup>nd guide thine heart in the way.

22 <sup>H</sup>earken unto thy father that begat thee, and <sup>d</sup>espise not thy mother when she is old.

23 <sup>B</sup>uy the truth, and <sup>s</sup>ell it not; also wisdom, and instruction, and understanding.

24 The <sup>f</sup>ather of the righteous shall greatly rejoice: and he that begetteth a wise child <sup>s</sup>hall have joy of him.

25 Thy father and thy mother shall be glad, <sup>a</sup>nd she that bare thee shall rejoice.

26 <sup>M</sup>y son, <sup>g</sup>ive me thine heart, and <sup>l</sup>et thine eyes observe my ways.

Hos. xiv. 9. 2 Pet. i. 19.

V. 20-22. (Notes Deut. xxi. 18-21. Marg. Ref.)—The latter clause is literally, 'Despise not thy mother, because she is grown old.' The very reason why the son ought to love, honour, and be a comfort to her, as far as he possibly can.

V. 23. 'Riches should be employed to get learning; not learning to gather up riches,' (Lord Bacon).—'Spare no costs for truth's sake, neither depart from it for any gains.' The knowledge of divine truth, with that profession and obedience which are inseparable from it, often costs much; not only much labour, but loss of property, friends, character, liberty, and even life: yet it cannot be bought too dear. We should determine to make the truth our own, though it cost us our lives; and not to sell it at any price. Christ is this truth. Many, like the rich young man, Herod, Felix, and Agrippa, will not go to the price of becoming his true disciples; and many, after professing themselves his disciples, like Demas, forsake him, and sell the truth, having loved this present world. But true Christians count all but loss, for the excellency of the knowledge of him.

V. 24, 25. 'There is no greater joy <sup>a</sup> parent can have, than to see his son take virtuous courses.—Let not thy father and mother then want this singular pleasure; but by thy well-doing fill the heart of her that bare thee with joy and triumph, who for all the pains and care, that she hath had in thy birth, and about thy education, desires no other requital, but only this.' (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 26. 'Give thyself wholly to wisdom.'—If this verse be considered merely as the words of Solomon to his son, or to the reader, it means no more than an affectionate call for earnest attention to instruction, and especially to the subsequent important caution. But in these chapters, Wisdom, (that is, Christ, the Word and Wisdom of God,) seems to address the reader, as at the beginning of the book; and on that supposition, this verse is a call of Christ to every reader, to give him his heart. The law demands love to God, with the whole heart and soul; but sin and the world have possession of it in fallen creatures; and the express design of the gospel is to bring us, by repentance and faith, to give our hearts to the Saviour, and to God through him; that he may there set up his kingdom, write his law, and reign the undisputed lord of all our affections. And unless this call be obeyed, all else will be decidedly rejected.

V. 27, 28. (Note, xxii. 14. Marg. Ref.)—'A narrow pit,' out of which it is extremely difficult to escape. (Notes, ii. v.-vii.)—'Such are her arts, notwithstanding all the straits and hardships thou shalt suffer by her; it will be an hard matter, when thou art once engaged, to get quit of her.'—'She is of no other use in the world, which already is too bad, but to make it worse, by increasing the number of disloyal and faithless men.' (Bp. Patrick.)—'She seduceth many, and causeth them to offend God.' (Note, v. 14.)

V. 29. 'Every wickedness brings mischief with it: but who is the man that especially draws on himself all manner of sorrows and inconveniences, both in soul, body, and estate? Who is he that raiseth quarrels and contentions upon every trifles? Who is he that is full of idle, obscene, and unsavoury words? Who is he that in distempered frays gets stripes and wounds? Who is he that afflicts his eyes with deflections and inflammations?' (Bp. Hall.) But no translation or paraphrase can do justice to the concise, abrupt, and energetic manner of the original.

V. 30. 'They that are the last at the wine.' 'He that sits long at the wine, that hunts about from one tavern to another, where he may find the most exquisite wine.'

V. 34, 35. The perils, to which drunken men expose themselves, are as imminent as if they lay down to sleep upon the unstable waves of the sea, or upon the top of the ship's mast in a storm. A drunken man may be beaten and bruised, and not be sensible of it at the time; but he will feel it severely afterwards: yet so inveterate are his habits, and so great his infatuation; that as soon as he has, with difficulty, shaken off the drowsiness of the last night's debauch, he is determined to seek it yet again. No loss, pain, sickness, poverty, ill-treatment, dangers, or deliverances, can prevail with him so much as, sincerely and constantly, to desire to break his chain.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1-18. How good are all the laws and counsels of the Lord! His prohibitions only say to us, "Do thyself no harm." He "giveth us all things richly to enjoy," as far as it is good for us; and then enters his paternal caveat against our disgracing, or ruining, ourselves by excess. He requires his rational creatures to be the lords, and not the slaves, of their animal appetites: and how mean and senseless is it, to rush upon indulgences, when the honour of God, the good of our neighbour, and our own advantage, concur in laying the appetite under a temporary interdict! Such is the law, in all its strictness; and its goodness renders the transgression of it inexcusable. But the gospel alone encourages us with the assurance of pardon and effectual grace; and through the motives, encouragements, and aids thus proposed to us, we may cheerfully hearken to the instructions of wisdom, and hope practically to derive benefit from them.—Let us then apply our hearts unto instruction, and "our ears unto the words of knowledge." Thus we shall learn to avoid every inexpedient indulgence, and to be of his mind, who, "would eat no flesh whilst the world stood, rather than cause his weak brother to offend." We shall consider times and circumstances, where we are, and what is before us, and what impression our conduct may make, or what effects it may produce, upon others: we shall place the strongest guard on the weakest side; and when we most feel our weakness, we shall shun temptation, or be doubly earnest in prayer to overcome it: we shall not allow a desire after the delicacies, which we find to be ensnaring to our souls; and shall endeavour most to practise abstemiousness, where incentives to excess most abound. He, who is thus instructed, will feel little inclination to come to the table of a selfish man, however well it is spread, or however pressingly he is invited. For what should he do there? Edifying conversation would be thrown away; and it would be worse than a waste of words, to speak sweet language to a man, whom he cannot but regard with a mixture of pity and contempt.—He, who hears the words of Christ, will beware also of covetousness. In his honest industry he will aim to do his duty, but will not "labour to be rich;" he will not set his eyes, or his heart, on such fleeting treasures, knowing how speedily and certainly a separation must take place. For he, whose treasures are left on earth, and whose soul is in hell, will find that he coveted what was not; that his wealth was a phantom, but his crimes a reality. Who then, that is wise, would remove the old landmark, or take possession of the estate of the fatherless, or get wealth by injustice, or oppression of the poor? For their Redeemer is mighty, (though he became poor, that he might be their brother and redeemer;) and he will plead their cause with those that wrong them. But if any are resolved to grow rich by such means, we must let them alone: the covetous Pharisees derided even Christ, when he warned them to be faithful in the unrighteous mammon: and he bids us, not to "speak in the ears of a fool, for he will despise the wisdom of our words." But surely we shall not envy sinners; let us but live conscientiously in the fear of God all the day long, and wait for the mercy of our Lord Jesus Christ unto eternal life: and when the end cometh, and our expectations are fully answered, we shall find that true godliness is great gain.—As the Lord commands us, with a solemn introduction, not to withhold correction from our children, but beat them with the rod to save their souls from destruction: so we may expect, that he will correct us for our good, if we are the objects of his special love. Let us then take affliction in good part, and seek to have it sanctified; that we "may be partakers of his holiness." Thus our teachers will rejoice on our account; nay, the Lord himself will "rejoice over us to do us good:" and, obeying his commands and copying his example, in educating our children, we may hope to enjoy with thankful exulting hearts the highest satisfaction that can be derived from outward things, while we witness their pious, wise, and useful conduct, in the situations which Providence shall allot them; and may cheerfully leave the world, assured that the best part of all we knew, spoke, or did, will survive us, and through them be made useful to the next generation.

V. 19-35. The gracious Saviour, who purchased for his people pardon and peace, with all the affection of a kind preceptor, yea, of a tender parent, counsels us to "hear and be wise, and to guide our hearts in his ways:" and at the same time he is ready to assist us in obeying every one of his injunctions. "Be not," says he, "amongst winebibbers, amongst riotous eaters of flesh: for the drunkard and the glutton shall come to poverty," and the "drowsiness," which such excess occasions, "will clothe a man with rags." Mark, says he, and learn wisdom by the painful experience of other men: Who has more misery and sorrow than his neighbours? Who is always engaged in riots, fightings, or lawsuits? Who renders himself despised or hated by his babblings? Who is frequently covered with bruises, or is laid up with dangerous wounds, when neither called to defend himself, nor his friends, nor his country? Who carries the marks of his distempered body, in the redness of his eyes, and in his bloated countenance? Do you not see that these are the wretched appendages of those, "that tarry long at the wine, that go to seek mixed wine?" Do you envy their advantages? or do you wish to be exempted from such miseries? If you desire the latter, then beware of contracting the habit of drinking beyond the bounds of strict temperance. The wine may sparkle in the glass, and appear beautiful to the eye, and drunken poets may write very ingenious things in praise of it; it may also please the palate, and exhilarate the mind for a moment; but at "the last it biteth like a serpent, and stingeth like an adder." Whatever exceeds exact sobriety, is poisoned: it is far worse than the fabled cup of Circe, which transformed men into brutes; for it inflames the passions, and fits them for every hateful crime: it ruins a man's constitution and character, and tends to beggar his family: it is an incentive to the basest lusts, and causes many to fall into that deep ditch and narrow pit, from which so few escape with their lives; making them an easy prey to those bad women, who lie in wait for them, and whose constant employment it is, to increase the transgressors amongst men: it looses the tongue to utter every thing impious, polluting, and provoking: it leads a man, without precaution, to run himself into unnumbered dangers; and yet it fascinates him into such a love for his cruel oppressor and his galling chains, that he only sleeps to recruit himself, that when he awakes he may return to his destructive indulgence! Who then, that has common sense, would contract such a habit, or sell himself to an iniquity, which tends to such accumulated guilt and misery, and exposes a man every day to the danger of dying intoxicated and awaking in hell? Thus the wisdom and word of God warns men against this common but fatal vice: and He exhorts young persons to notice the admonitions of their parents to this effect: "Hearken," says he, "unto thy father that begat thee, and despise not thy mother when she is old." Their counsel is salutary, their authority from God, the child's obligations are great; and the guilt of those that despise their aged parents is exceedingly heinous. And it should be the aim and honest ambition, of every young person, to be the joy, comfort, and honour of his aged father and mother, in their declining years.—But the Saviour himself addresses us, as children, and says, "My son, give me thy heart; and let thine eyes observe my ways:" and if we desire to be wise and happy, we should surrender them to him, and he will prepare them for himself, and make them a treasury of wisdom and grace, that from that abundance we may speak and do what is right and good. Thus his salvation is freely bestowed upon us: yet we must "buy the truth," we must spare no cost or pains, and sacrifice every lust and interest, that we may purchase this inestimable prize. On the other hand, we must refuse to give up, or to act inconsistently with, our religious profession, or to relinquish the pursuit of wisdom; even if we could be tempted to it, by the offer of all the kingdoms of the world and the glory of them. And what part soever of our conduct we may at any time be sorry for; we shall not, when the end comes, repent of following this counsel, even though we should lose our lives, rather than deviate from it.

NOTES.

CHAP. XXIV. V. 1, 2. (Notes, i. 10-19. iii. 31, 32. Marg. Ref.)

V. 3-6. Some render the first two of these verses thus: 'Let thy house be builded in wisdom, and let it be established with understanding; and the chambers will be filled by knowledge with all precious and pleasant riches.' The original is future: a counsel rather than an affirmation.—Dis-

10 If 'thou faint in the day of adversity, thy strength is 'small.

11 If 'thou forbear to deliver them that are drawn unto death, and those that are ready to be slain;

12 If thou sayest, Behold, we knew it not; 'doth not he that pondereth the heart consider it? and he 'that keepeth thy soul, doth not he know it? 'and shall not he render to every man according to his works?

13 My son, 'eat thou honey, because it is good; and the honeycomb, which is sweet 'to thy taste:

14 So 'shall the knowledge of wisdom be unto thy soul, 'when thou hast found it; then 'there shall be a reward, and thy expectation shall not be cut off.

honesty in many cases seems the readiest road to wealth, but prudence and piety lead the surest way to durable prosperity. A wise, upright, and pious person is most likely to advance and establish himself and family in a comfortable and respectable situation, and to obtain that plenty which conduces to the real enjoyment of life, and enables a man to do good; and his sober, discreet, and charitable use of it, renders it precious and pleasant. His wisdom also will prove a greater security to him, and give him a greater ascendancy over others, than mere power and authority could do: by knowledge he increases his strength: and when such a wise man is placed upon the throne, he will so conduct himself, as to avoid contests if he can; and if he cannot, he will take such good counsel in waging war, that he will provide well for the safety of himself and of the state; even though he have to cope with an antagonist far more powerful than himself. (Notes, xi. 14. xv. 22. xx. 18.)

V. 7. (Note, xv. 24.) The careless, sensual, and selfish man is the fool here spoken of. Wisdom is out of his reach; he is of too low and grovelling a disposition to raise his thoughts to so noble an object, or to bestow the pains which are requisite in order to obtain it. (Note, Ps. cxii. 6, 7.) He openeth not his mouth in the convention of the elders, to consult about public concerns: not because he is too modest to speak his thoughts, but because he hath nothing to say; and because he little cares how matters go with others, or even with his own soul, provided he may be unmolested in his worthless pursuits and gratifications! or, because he is rash and headstrong, he is not admitted to speak on such occasions.

V. 8, 9. 'He that deviseth new ways and arts of cheating or doing mischief, shall be branded with the odious name of "an inventor of evil things." (Rom. i. 30.) (Bp. Patrick.)—He who deviseth mischief, will be adjudged a mischievous man, even though he do not effect his purpose. The thought, intention, or desire, to commit any kind of vice, nay, the very harbouring the idea in the imagination, or admitting it without abhorrence, is sin; but he who not only devises evil, but scoffs at the precepts and warnings of God's word, ought to be abhorred, and will become abominable to men, as he is an abomination among them.

V. 10. 'Man has no trial of his strength, till he be in troubles.' When afflictions depress a man's spirits, and unfit him for present duty, and lead him to neglect it, it is manifest that his faith and grace are weak, and consequently he is wanting in vigour and courage.

V. 11, 12. If any man knows that his neighbour is in danger of losing his life, by false accusation, or a malicious prosecution, or in any other way, he is bound to do all in his power to deliver him. But if self-love, indolence, cowardice, or reluctance to incur expense or inconvenience, induce him to remain quiet, he will be deemed an accessory to the crime, and it will be in vain for him to say that he was not fully acquainted with the matter, or aware of the danger, that it was none of his business, and he knew not how to prevent it; for the Lord seeth through, and will expose such fallacious excuses. 'This chiefly belongs to magistrates, who ought not to be overawed by great men from undertaking the protection and relief of those who are unjustly oppressed.' (Bp. Patrick.)—Many of the proverbs, no doubt, were particularly intended for the instruction and warning of rulers; who may be supposed likely to notice the maxims of a great king, more than those of inferior men: but there is generally an important meaning, in which each proverb is applicable to the case of every reader.—'The magistrate ought to be the guardian of innocent men's lives; and private persons, in their places, ought to oppose, without sedition, unjust severity as much as they are able. There are many examples of this in Scripture. Jonathan opposed his father, and helped to preserve David. Obadiah fed the prophets, whom Jezebel designed to have killed. The eunuch pulled up Jeremiah out of the dungeon; and the midwives saved the Israelites' children; as Rahab afterwards did the spies.'—'Examples to the contrary, are such as that of Doeg, who in compliance with Saul's fury, slew the innocent priests.' (Melancthon.) He might have included all the courtiers and officers of Saul, who allowed such an impious and unrighteous cruelty to be perpetrated without resistance, or even remonstrance, except that of the footmen or guards who bravely refused to obey the murderous orders of their sovereign, choosing to obey God rather than man; and who set a noble example worthy of imitation by persons in similar circumstances, to the end of time.

15 *Lay not wait, O wicked man, against the dwelling of the righteous; *spoil not his resting-place.

16 For *a just man falleth seven times, and riseth up again: *but the wicked shall fall into mischief.

17 *Rejoice not when thine enemy falleth, and let not thine heart be glad when he stumbleth:

18 Lest the LORD see it, and it *displease him, *and he turn away his wrath from him.

19 *Fret not thyself because of evil men, *neither be thou envious at the wicked;

20 For *there shall be no reward to the evil man; *the *candle of the wicked shall be put out.

21 My son, *fear thou the LORD and the king: *and *meddle not with them that are *given to change:

22 For *their calamity shall rise suddenly; and *who knoweth the ruin of them both?

23 These *things also belong to the wise. *It is not good to have respect of persons in judgment.

24 He *that saith unto the wicked, Thou art righteous; *him shall the people curse, nations shall abhor him.

V. 13, 14. Men eat the honey from the comb, because it is pleasant to the taste, at the same time that it is wholesome and nutrimental. So is the knowledge of divine wisdom to those who have begun to acquire it. Their relish for it will increase with their progress in it; their present pleasure is the earnest of their future and certain recompense. Does a man eat honey because it is pleasant and wholesome? Let him seek knowledge for the same reason, and he will find it far more pleasant and profitable. (Note, xxii. 17, 18.)

V. 15, 16. Let no wicked man presume, through the arrogance of prosperity, to plot secretly, or to attack openly, the mean and unprotected residence of the righteous, as this will only end in his own ruin. For though the righteous may fall into many calamities, yet he shall recover from them all, but the wicked will shortly fall into absolute misery, to rise no more. *These words are commonly, not only in sermons, but in books, applied to falling into sin; and that men may the more securely indulge themselves in sin, and yet think themselves good men, they have cunningly added something to them. For they are commonly cited thus, "a just man falleth seven times a day," which last words are not in any translation (much less in the original) but only in some corrupt editions of the vulgar Latin.—And therefore we must make use of other places for the confuting the fancy of perfection in this life, and the comfort of those who are cast down by their lapses into sin; and take heed of reading the holy Scripture so carelessly, as to turn our medicine into poison, which is the fault of those who from such mistakes, give way to their evil affections, and let them carry them into sin.' (Bp. Patrick.) This is an important note, for nothing does more mischief than applying texts of Scripture merely by the sound of the words, to subjects with which they have no connection. There are plain texts enough to prove every scriptural doctrine, and to answer every scriptural purpose; but pressing texts into any particular service, contrary to their plain meaning, (as in this case,) not only serves to deceive the inconsiderate, but likewise to rivet the prejudices, and strengthen the suspicions, of opposers; just as bringing forward a number of suspected witnesses in any important cause, after a sufficient number of creditable witnesses had been examined, would make the judge and jury, and audience, suspect even the good witnesses, and would create a prejudice against the cause itself, which needed to be thus supported.

V. 17, 18. These verses are a caution not only against outwardly exulting over the miseries of an enemy, (which is not generally creditable even in this evil world,) but also against being secretly pleased at them. To this our selfish nature is peculiarly prone, but it is totally contrary to the law of God. "Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself," as every one feels when he is the insulted sufferer. Even the secret indulgence of such a malignant joy, being known to God, might induce him to turn away his wrath from the afflicted party, and lay it on him who rejoiced in the calamity. (Note, xvii. 5.)—Such proverbs are perfectly coincident with the precepts of the New Testament; and all the passages in the Psalms, or elsewhere, which seem to breathe a contrary spirit, must have a meaning consistent with them, even as the exultations of the martyrs, &c. in Revelation, over the destruction of their persecutors, (Rev. xvii. 5—7. xviii. 20.) must be capable of an interpretation which accords to the precepts of our Saviour's sermon on the mount. But to rejoice in the triumphs of the cause of God and his church, of truth and holiness, over the desperate enemies of all good, is widely different from the spirit of revenge for personal injuries.

V. 19, 20. (Note, Ps. xxxvii. 1, 2.) "Be not angry because of evil men," &c. The word translated revenge, is generally rendered latter end, or end, (xxiii. 18.) "There shall be no end of plagues to the evil man; the light of the wicked shall be put out." (Old Translation.) (Marg. Ref.)

V. 21, 22. 'Have nothing to do with those, who vary from all good laws and orders, and are affected to innovation and change, both of princes and government.' (Bp. Hall.) Kings and rulers must be revered and obeyed, in all things lawful, by all who fear God, and obey his commands. (Marg. Ref.) The late events, for a series of years in Europe, have abundantly shewn, that Solomon's wisdom was far greater than that of modern philosophers, so called; or rather, that the wisdom of God is infinitely above the wisdom of man. The ruin of those who rebel against God, and of those who excite disturbances in the state, comes upon them in the most unsuspected manner, and is dreadful beyond conception. (Note, xvii. 11.)

V. 23. The following things should be peculiarly considered by all that would act as wise men, especially in the capacity of rulers and magistrates. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 24, 25. The magistrate who acquits a wicked man, or decides in his favour because of his wealth or power, will be generally and justly execrated: but they who restrain and punish evil-doers of every rank, will have the satisfaction of being generally favoured, and the advantage of having many prayers offered for them, and blessings pronounced on them. Those authors, or orators, who compose panegyrics on wicked men; those courtiers and dependents who flatter ungodly princes and nobles; and, above all, those ministers who, through fear, sloth, ignorance, or love of filthy lucre, give that encouragement to wicked men, which belongs only to the righteous, are by parity of reason included, and will be at length universally execrated; whilst they who act faithfully will have the comfort and benefit of it.

V. 26. He, who speaks honestly, faithfully, seasonably, and to the purpose, whether as a judge, a witness, a senator, a counsellor, a minister, or a private person, will meet with general respect and affection. At least this ought to be the case; and every one, who experiences the benefit of the right answer, will be attached to him that gave it.

V. 27. The most needful and profitable work should be first attended to. Men ought to employ their labour and expense in cultivating the land, before they proceed to build and beautify their houses, or furnish them in an elegant style. For if the house be built, and the land be neglected, another man will be likely to possess both of them. Or the proverb may mean, that everything should be done with deliberation, foresight, and contrivance: 'Get all ready, as well as count the cost, before you begin to build.'

V. 28. "Be not thou a witness against thy neighbour without cause: for wilt thou deceive with thy lips?" (Old Translation.)—The expression without cause, seems to imply, not only the case of a man who bears false witness; but that of him, who from personal resentment, or any other corrupt motive, testifies the truth against his neighbour, when there is no sufficient reason why he should do it;—when neither the glory of God, nor the benefit of man, requires it.

V. 29. (Marg. Ref.) 'He sheweth what is in the nature of the wicked: to revenge wrong for wrong.'

V. 30—34. (Note, vi. 6—11.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—20. The strong propensity in human nature to malignant and selfish tempers, renders repeated cautions against them necessary. But it must be as foolish as it is wicked, to "be envious against evil men, or to desire" a share in their unlawful gains; whilst "their heart studieth destruction, and their lips talk of mischief;" or to fret or distress ourselves at their short-lived success, in "laying wait against the dwelling of the righteous, and spoiling his resting-place;" for unless they repent, they will soon fall into mischief to rise no more;

and their wasting candle will expire in "the blackness of darkness for ever." But the righteous man, though repeatedly cast down into trouble, nay, should he be again and again overcome with strong temptations, shall rise superior to them all, and have an eternal dwelling and resting-place, which the wicked cannot approach. We may foresee, but we should not desire, the destruction of sinners: neither may we rejoice when our enemy falleth. Even when we are greatly injured, and sharply persecuted, we must not indulge such emotions of revenge, for the Lord will see it and be displeased; he will even suffer the haughty persecutor to proceed a little longer with impunity, rather than allow his people to harbour in any measure so malignant a spirit; and instead of punishing their persecutors, he will previously and sharply chastise them, to prepare them to meet deliverance in a more Christian manner. How displeasing then must that revenge be, which is generally excited by trivial or imaginary offences, and puts men upon evident crimes, in order to retaliate on the offender!—We are here again reminded of the value of true wisdom; which alone can give a man establishment in that kind of reputation and prosperity that is precious and desirable; for it will suggest to him the most beneficent designs, and afford him the greatest advantages for accomplishing them; and it will do more than all other things to render him safe and useful. But this wisdom is far too high and arduous a thing for the giddy and heedless part of mankind, who waste their lives in low pursuits or childish amusements. They only obtain this invaluable good, who bestow pains to obtain it: who are taught so to prize it for the sake of its effects, that they would pursue it, if it were with present pain and uneasiness; and they find such sweetness in it, that they would feed upon it, as men do on the purest honey, even if there were no future advantage from it. But the recompense is sure to those, who thus seek wisdom from the Lord; and its present usefulness is immense. Whilst foolish and wicked men either do not open their mouths in the gate, or, intruding into offices for which they are not qualified, only "darken counsel by words without knowledge;" wisdom renders a man fit for his station in the community, whatever it be. So that should he even be called to fill a throne, he will conduct public affairs with discretion, and benefit by the multitude of counsellors: and he will repress and be a terror to evil-doers alone. He will count it his highest honour to promote the happiness of his people; he will engage in no war, but for their protection and true interest; and his prudent conduct will do far more to secure success, and to strengthen the nation, and procure a safe and lasting peace, than any of those heroic achievements, which are so highly celebrated in the world.—We should never forget, that our heart-searching God will call us to account for the devices and thoughts of our heart. Instead, therefore, of inventing evil things with the mischievous person, or entertaining our minds with vain and sinful thoughts; we ought continually to be looking around us, to see what good we can do, or what mischief we can prevent; and we need not wait long for opportunities, if we be "zealous of good works." For if our neighbour, or even our enemy, be in danger of being ruined, condemned, or deeply injured, through malice or mistake, we are bound to risk every personal consequence for his deliverance. In such things, however, the deceitfulness of the heart must be peculiarly guarded against. For self-love suggests many plausible excuses, and the conscience may be bribed to bring in a favourable verdict: but the Lord will order a re-hearing of the cause; he will manifest the secrets of all hearts, and render unto every man according to his works: and if he find our excuses insufficient, and the effect of indolence, cowardice, self-indulgence, and unbelief, we shall be considered as chargeable with a share of that guilt, which we might have successfully opposed; and as having concurred in causing that misery, which we ought to have prevented.—But the same feebleness of mind, which causes many to faint in the day of adversity, induces numbers to shrink from such services, as cannot be performed, without giving offence to powerful oppressors; or to those of lower rank, who will not relieve the urgent necessities of the poor themselves, and then take it as a reflection upon them if others supply their deficiencies. This timid indolent spirit is often mistaken for meekness: but it is in fact a natural disposition, which as much needs correcting by divine grace, as the impetuous violence of self-sufficient courage does. We should therefore pray continually for the courage of faith, and the meekness of humility, and the persevering, enduring activity of fervent love.

V. 21-34. "These things belong unto the wise;" and, "if any man lack wisdom, let him ask of God."—But that wisdom which he bestows will never suffer a man to say, "I will do so to him, as he hath done to me; I will render unto him according to his work." For, in this spirit, the most exact evidence which could be given, even in a court of justice, would be criminal before God. On such occasions we should be afraid of officiousness, or of wrong motives, in being witness against our neighbour without a cause: but resentment generally warps the judgment, induces a man to make the worst of every circumstance, and thus leads him to deceive with his lips, and to become a slanderer and false accuser.—In like manner, "the wisdom which is from above," will effectually prevent the magistrate from "respecting persons in judgment;" and both the magistrate, and minister of religion, and every person, from saying "to the wicked, thou art righteous."—When this is done by the magistrate, "the people will curse him, nations will abhor him;" and though the minister, who flatters and deceives men's souls, may here be caressed and prospered; he will hereafter be more deeply and universally execrated than any other person in the world. But he who rebukes and reproves with affectionate faithfulness; whatever return he may have from men, shall have delight in the testimony of his conscience, in the good done by him, and in the favour of his God, and "a good blessing will come upon him."—In general, even here, he who studies to adapt his discourse to every case, in which he is required to speak, will find a measure of respect and attention; for "every man will kiss his lips, who giveth a right answer," and such as he derives good from.—But sloth and self-indulgence are the bane of all good. Whilst we go past "the field of the slothful, and the vineyard of the man void of understanding," and view them overgrown with thorns and nettles, and the fences all broken down: we see an emblem of the far more deplorable state of many souls. Every vile affection grows exceedingly in the hearts of vast multitudes, all their faculties are thrown open to the delusions or suggestions of the devil and his agent; nothing good has any root or growth there, and everlasting poverty is coming upon them as an armed man; yet they are saying, "a little sleep, a little slumber, a little folding of the hands to sleep!" A wise man will consider and receive instruction from the ruinous misconduct of a fool: though the fool will not profit by the example or counsel of a wise man. Let us then shew our wisdom, by taking the hint from the case of the sluggard, to redouble our diligence in every good thing, and to watch and pray more against the beginnings of so ruinous a vice. But many, who are diligent in worldly business, are slothful about their eternal interests. They mind minute concerns, but neglect the momentous: they embellish the house, but neglect the estate! Let us then learn to begin at the right end; and to do every thing in season, and in order, and with prudence, as well as diligence. And let us study to be "quiet, and mind our own business," conscientiously, and in the fear of God; let us honour and obey the king, and have nothing to do with those turbulent spirits, who are given to change, and always aiming to raise disturbances, and introduce innovations: thus we shall avoid the calamity and the ruin which come suddenly upon those, who rebel against God and the king; and shall so pass through things temporal, as finally to obtain the things which are eternal.

NOTES.

CHAP. XXV.—V. 1. Men, &c. 'The men whom Hezekiah appointed for that purpose.'—The friends of Hezekiah.' (Sept.)—It is probable, that Solomon himself, or some others, by his order, and under his inspection, had selected the proverbs contained in the preceding chapters, as most suited to general religious utility; but that all the rest of the three thousand were preserved by the kings of Israel, though not published for the use of the people; and that Hezekiah, with the concurrence, and under the superintendence of Isaiah, and other contemporary prophets, employed some competent persons among his servants to collect from the rest, the proverbs contained in this and the following chapters.

V. 2, 3. It is the glory of God that he knoweth all things most perfectly, and that he needeth no information or counsel; that he giveth no account of his matters, and concealeth his purposes from the most penetrating and intruding, except as he has unfolded some particulars of what he intended to do in future ages, to confirm his revelation of himself, and his truth and will, for men's encouragement and instruction in their duty. But earthly princes are in themselves as ignorant and fallible as their subjects: their honour therefore consists in investigating every matter with the utmost accuracy and attention. It behoves them to search out the revealed will of God, and to procure intelligence from every quarter, and information on every subject, connected with their important duties; and to avail themselves of the wisdom of others, whom they advise with as counsellors; that their laws, decisions, and measures, may be the result of knowledge, equity, sound policy, and mature deliberation, and conducive to the true interests of their subjects, and not the dictates of pride, ambition, resentment, passion, or caprice. Yet a wise king will be upon the reserve, as to his determinations, till the event discovers them: and it will often be as impracticable for others to dive into his secret intentions, as to measure the height of the heaven, or the depth of the earth.—Men cannot attain to the reason of all the secret doings of a king, even when he is upright, and doeth his duty.

V. 4, 5. As the artificer cannot make a beautiful cup or vessel, without well refining his metal, so a king cannot establish his throne in righteousness, till he remove wicked men from places of public trust, and drive them from his council, and from about his person.—They should not keep so much as one ill man about them, who oftentimes corrupts the whole court, and disturbs the whole kingdom.' (Bp. Patrick).—The modern maxim, that the private character of a minister of state should not be investigated, flatly contradicts the wisdom of Solomon, and of God.

V. 6, 7. (Note, Luke xiv. 7-11.) There can be no reasonable doubt but that our Lord referred to these verses in his admonition to the ambitious guests at the Pharisee's table, and was understood to do so. While, therefore, this

V. 16. Honey is often an emblem of sensual pleasure: though it be wholesome when eaten in moderation, yet when taken to excess it will produce a surfeit. Those animal indulgences, which are lawful in themselves, and placed within our reach; (as if we had found honey and it were all our own,) should yet be used with great moderation, or they will lead us into guilt and trouble.

V. 17. Our intercourse with neighbours cannot be conducted in comfort and cordiality, without discretion, as well as sincerity. Unseasonable, tedious, and too frequent visits, without any invitation, or upon such as is general and slight, and indulging too freely at the expense of others, will create disgust. Such behaviour leaves an unfavourable opinion of a man's character on the mind of his neighbour; and it not only appears selfish, but presses too hard upon the other's selfishness, and on both accounts may probably terminate in weariness or even in enmity.

V. 18. A maul, &c. Or a club, by which a man is beaten down to the ground: a "dasher in pieces." (Nah. ii. 1. original.)

V. 19. "As a broken tooth, or a leg out of joint, not only fails a man when he comes to use it, but likewise puts him into pain: so doth a faithless person serve them that depend on him, when they have the greatest need of his help." (Marg. Ref.) And such also is the confidence, that the faithless person himself places in riches, or craft, or great friends; which some time or other will disappoint him to his great grief, when he expects the most from them.' (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 20. It would be an inhumanity peculiarly unseasonable to take away a poor man's raiment, or the covering of his bed, in the depth of winter; and it is observed that when vinegar is poured on nitre, their contrariety produces a violent effervescence: so incongruous and disquieting are the expressions of excessive mirth, in company with one who is greatly troubled in his mind. — Nitre, in this place, does not signify the salt now commonly so called, or saltpetre: but probably a fixed alkali called nitrum by the Romans; and certainly some alkaline composition, which was used instead of soap by the Jews. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 21, 22. The apostle hath quoted these verses from the Septuagint, verbatim, (except the last clause,) in his most beautiful exhortations to Christians, enforced by the consideration of the mercies of God to them. (Note, Rom. xii. 20, 21.) Such a quotation is the strongest testimony to the divine authority of the book whence it is made; and clearly evinces that the same rule of duty is contained in both testaments: however ancient scribes and pharisees, and modern writers in general, may have overlooked it. The law of love is not expounded more spiritually, in any single precept either of Christ or his apostles, than in this exhortation. Seize the moment of distress, to shew kindness to him that hates thee. This will resemble the effort of the refiner with a piece of metal, untractable by ordinary means: he surrounds it with coals intensely heated, and thus either melts or consumes it: and, however the plan may succeed with him, who thus labours to overcome evil with good, "verily he shall in no wise lose his reward."

V. 23. The meaning of this verse in our translation is obvious and instructive: yet the original seems to convey another meaning. "As the north wind produces rain," (which it does in some countries,) "so a backbiting tongue produceth an angry countenance." Either interpretation shews how hateful backbiters are, and how they should be frowned upon.

V. 24. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 25. (Note, 13. Marg. Ref.)

V. 26. A troubled fountain or corrupt spring sends forth polluted streams, to the disappointment and annoyance of the neighbourhood. Thus, when a righteous man falls into any evident sin, in the presence of the wicked; or when he pays unseemly homage to them, from fear or interest; or when he falls under their oppressive power; in different ways these events tend to prejudice and embolden the minds of sinners, and are a grief, a snare, or a discouragement to the servants of God.

gives his sanction to the book of Proverbs, it also shews, that these maxims may fairly be applied to similar cases, and that we need not confine the interpretation exclusively to the subject which gave rise to the maxim. The ambitious competition of courtiers, the disgrace of being placed lower than a man's self-sufficiency had arrogated to him, and the honour paid to modest worth by wise princes, gave our Lord the occasion of counselling the guests; and that admonition forms one of the standard rules by which he deals with those who profess themselves his disciples. "Before honour is humility, and a haughty spirit before a fall."—The last words, 'whom thine eyes have seen,' are thought by some learned men redundant; and some add them to the next verse; but, perhaps, they may allude to the case of a person newly brought to court, getting a sight of the prince, flattering himself with the hopes of high favour and preferment, but giving disgust by a self-sufficient conduct, and so finally excluded from the king's presence. An apt emblem of many vain-glorious professors of Christianity!

V. 8-10. Precipitation in commencing contention, can arise only from fierce passions, pride, and ignorance, or forgetfulness of consequences. This is equally applicable to engaging in foreign wars, or in civil dissensions; and to entering on lawsuits, controversies, or any other private contests. They who are most eager to contend, are generally least able to maintain their ground; consequently, their boastings and menaces frequently end in their own disgrace, and they bring themselves into inextricable difficulties. To avoid this, men should previously consider what they are about to do; and if they have been materially injured, they should calmly expostulate with their offending neighbour, and state to him their earnest desire of agreement upon any reasonable terms, and thus endeavour, by compromise or reference, to render an open contest unnecessary. None should, however, in any case, divulge private transactions to others, or traduce a man's character out of resentment: for this will take away the prospect of an amicable settlement; and if words of this kind be reported to him, and he can shew them to be in any measure false and slanderous, or overcharged, the disgrace will rebound upon the speaker, and, perhaps, become indelible. (Matt. xvii. 15-17.)—This is precisely the instruction of the New Testament. (Marg. Ref.) Solomon, speaking by divine inspiration, gave the same instructions, which were afterwards authoritatively given by his illustrious antitype.

V. 11, 12. A word of counsel, encouragement, or reproof, when it is spoken with propriety, and is well-timed, and suited to the occasion, is conspicuously beautiful. As when apples of gold are painted, or presented to our view, in lattice-work of silver; 'where the fine fruit receives a new charm, by shewing itself through the elegant apertures of the basket.' (Hervey.)—And when a wise reprover, and one that receives the reproof in good part, happen to meet, no jewels of gold can be so ornamental as this becoming behaviour.

V. 13. Liquor, cooled with ice or snow, preserved or brought from the mountains for that purpose, according to the custom in hot countries, is very grateful in the heat of summer, especially to the husbandman when gathering in his harvest. Thus faithful ambassadors, or messengers, refresh the minds of those who employ them in business of great importance. (25.)

V. 14. 'He that makes bountiful promises of great gifts, which will never be performed, is like a cloud which makes a shew of that rain, which it will not and cannot yield.' (Bp. Hall.) (Notes, Hos. vi. 4. Jude 12.)

V. 15. By submission and patience under rebukes, and humble intreaties, even the prince, who has been greatly offended, may be pacified; whereas petulance and passion would inflame his resentment, and prove of fatal consequence. Nay, soft persuasive language is generally the most effectual, to prevail over the obdurate mind and stubborn resolution, and to carry the point in the midst of great difficulties. The marrow cannot be obtained, till "the bone be broken:" this is, therefore, an apt emblem of the advantages of gentle means, which, contrary to apparent probability, break the bone that violence would have rendered more obdurate.

27 It is not good to eat much honey: so for men to search their own glory is not glory.

28 He that hath no rule over his own spirit, is like a city that is broken down, and without walls.

CHAP. XXVI.

Divers maxims, concerning fools, sluggards, intermeddlers with strife, those who do mischief in sport, tale-bearers, dissemblers, liars, and flatterers, 1—28.

AS snow 'in summer, and as rain in harvest, 'so honour is not seemly for a fool.

V. 27. To supply a negative, in order to explain a maxim of wisdom, as in this verse, seems indefensible; and yet, of the various interpretations which have been proposed, in order to avoid this difficulty, none gives satisfaction, at least to me.—Might not the latter clause be read interrogatively: "To eat honey to excess is not good; and is it glory for men to seek their own glory?"—A moderate regard to reputation is proper; as it is to eat honey moderately: but does not the vain-glorious man run into pernicious excess, by rioting on what he delights in, as much as the man who eats honey till he surfeits with it? (Note, 16.)

V. 28. The man who has no command over his passions, especially over his anger, lies open to the assault of every invader: any one may exasperate and torment him, and rob him of his comfort, his peace, and his reason, at pleasure: every temptation seduces him into sin, and the most trifling concerns involve him in the most serious contests.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—15. We ought carefully to collect, and readily to communicate, the instructive lessons which wise and good men have left behind them: but selection is in this case of vast importance. The whole of what even Solomon wrote was not thought proper to be published. And to communicate to the public indiscriminately, all that eminent men have left in manuscript, is not only an injustice to their characters, but a detriment to mankind: by these means the effusions of an unguarded hour are sent forth into the world under the sanction of a great name; and, alas! men's follies and mistakes are more likely to meet a favourable reception, than the result of their sober judgment and mature deliberation. This is therefore always an injudicious, and often an infamous, because a mercenary, practice.—It is not for us presumptuously to search into the deep things of God, whose glory it is to conceal his decrees in impenetrable secrecy: but let us diligently learn his revealed will, that we may believe and do it, and humbly bound our enquiries where he bounds his information. For how should we be able to know any thing of his unrevealed purposes; when we cannot discover the intentions of our earthly governors with any certainty, unless they inform us of them?—The honour of kings does not consist in external magnificence, numerous attendants, powerful armies, or splendid achievements: much less in domineering over their subjects, and in indulging their lusts and passions. But it consists in diligently learning and attending to the duties of their high station; and in rendering their whole administration equitable, salutary, and conducive to the peace and happiness of mankind; and in copying his example, who "putteth away the ungodly as dross;" that "their thrones may be established in righteousness." For, the reformation of the court, and the good example of those who possess authority or favour with the prince, will produce a salutary effect through the subordinate ranks of the community. This indeed is an arduous attempt, and requires both resolution and address: a frowning countenance, and severe reproofs, and decisive measures must be used; and men's characters must be enquired into, and made trial of, as the finer discriminates between the gold and the dross. But the advantages will abundantly compensate the trouble, to those who are enabled to go through with such a reform. The vain-glorious men, who boast themselves of those talents and endowments which they possess not, and excite expectations which they are sure to disappoint; being like clouds and wind without rain; and who assume the chief places, and claim the precedence wherever they go, are not fit to be employed in services of this kind. Indeed whether such persons are found in palaces or churches, they are to be suspected and kept down. He, who is fit to stand in the presence of the king, does not at first sight, or upon the first intimations of favour, aspire to the chief places, or want to thrust out his seniors and superiors: but is diffident, and reluctant to engage in such arduous affairs; and it will be needful to invite him to "come up hither;" and not to put him lower in the presence of the prince, than he hath placed himself. And, in like manner, he, who is qualified to be the minister of the Lord of hosts, and hath seen his glory in the face of Jesus Christ, will be proportionably sensible of his own unworthiness and insufficiency. He may be induced by zeal and love, and a sense of duty, to desire this good work, but he will not rush upon it with an inconsiderate forwardness, nor be disposed to thrust himself into the most conspicuous places, but be satisfied in an obscure sphere, until he be evidently called up higher. Thus in every thing modesty and humility attend real excellency, and precede durable honour: but pride and ostentation are evidences of a worthless character, and lead to contempt and disgrace. The love of peace, and that gentle and circumspect behaviour which best secures it, spring from humility. He, who considers the fatal effects of contention in public and in private life, will use every means to avoid all occasions of it. He will meditate seriously upon the causes and consequences of any contest, before he will venture upon it: he will practise equity, sincerity, candour, and long forbearance; and will study that softness of speech that breaketh the bone, and disarmeth the resentment of the powerful, or the haughty, and winneth to reason and justice those who are infringing on the rights of others. He will not disclose to another person the injuries that he hath received, till he hath debated the matter with the injurious party: much less will he propagate a distorted and aggravated report, as is too common in such cases. Thus he will be generally enabled to avoid litigations:

whilst precipitation, unguarded language, and partial and public statements of facts to the injury of men's reputations, lead to irreconcilable discords; and often terminate in irretrievable detriment to the circumstances and character of the offender. And let it be observed, that the hasty entrance upon religious controversy is as perilous to a man's spirit, as engaging in a duel is to his life; and is often as fatal to the welfare of the church, as needless wars are to the community.—It is well worth our while to study acceptable words fitted to take effect; and to know how both to give seasonable counsel, and to yield an obedient ear to salutary reproof; which is very becoming a man professing godliness, and peculiarly conducive to his advantage and usefulness. Indeed, prudence, modesty, and faithfulness will render a man valuable in every situation, from that of an ambassador to a powerful monarch, to that of an ordinary messenger to a man of low condition; and will conduce greatly to the comfort of those who employ him.

V. 16—28. In public as well as in private life, misplaced confidence must induce uneasiness, disappointment, and disasters: and if a monarch rely on a mercenary and unfaithful minister of state; he can have no security that he will not betray him in the critical conjuncture, like a broken tooth, and a foot out of joint, and thus involve him in the deepest distress. And what fidelity to his prince can be expected from him, who is a daring rebel against God, and who sacrifices every relative and domestic duty, to the indulgence of his avarice, or his lust? But a minister, who feareth God and worketh righteousness, and whose integrity and prudence are approved, relieves him of his cares and solicitude, and excites the confidence that good news will be heard, from time to time, out of those distant countries with which he is connected, which will be grateful as the cold water to the thirsty traveller. How welcome then should the faithful messengers of God be to us, who are approved by their Lord for declaring the truth as it is! and, who bring good news from heaven, that far country, from which we sinners had great reason to expect heavy tidings. May he furnish, and send forth, such into all the nations of the earth!—In order to live in peace, and to be prepared to resist temptation, nothing is more important than habitual self-government: for "he that hath no rule over his own spirit, is like a city that is broken down, and without walls." In this case a man lies open to the incursion of every enemy: and if he listen, (as it is most likely he will,) to false witnesses and slanderers, his life must be one continued scene of contention and vexation, of sin and misery. Indeed, we ought not only to avoid these hateful and mischievous vices ourselves; but to frown every calumniator from our presence: and a frown will generally suffice, for they seldom persevere in coming where they are not made welcome. But self-government must be exercised over all our passions and appetites, even in respect of things lawful: that, while many ruin themselves and others by criminal gratifications, and some are useless, troublesome, and uncomfortable through inexpedient indulgence; we may know how to use the good gifts of Providence with thankful moderation, to take what is conducive to health and comfort, and to avoid all excess. It is also incumbent upon us to conduct our social intercourse with our neighbours in a prudent manner, without encroaching, or giving umbrage to them: at the same time we may be thankful, that we never can come to the Lord unseasonably, or too frequently; and that he will never be weary of us or displeased with us, for asking too much of him; and we should make his love, and not man's selfishness, the pattern of our conduct toward others, though not of our expectations from them. We should also learn to sympathize with the afflicted; and we ought no more to wound their feelings by impertinent levity, than to injure the poor by cruelty and oppression: and we ought steadily and constantly to be aiming to overcome evil with good; and to watch for an opportunity, when an enemy is in want or trouble, to shew our good-will to him by a seasonable relief. This may melt him into kindness: or, if, contrary to our intention, it should only increase his guilt, yet it will conduce to our own good, and the Lord will reward us. We should moreover keep a peculiar watch over our tempers and our words, whilst in the company of ungodly men: and we ought by no means to pay undue respect to them for any secular ends; lest our example should produce a prejudicial effect on others, and leave an unfavourable impression concerning our religion on their minds. If we see the righteous cast down by oppression before the wicked; we should desire to possess our souls in faith and patience, and to keep silence in so evil a time. And though we may not seek our own glory, yet the honour of our profession should be very near our hearts; and we ought to be willing rather to suffer death, than to live to the disgrace of the doctrine of God our Saviour.

NOTES.

CHAP. XXVI. V. 1. Snow in summer and rain in harvest are unseasonable; and often prejudicial, in every country: but in the land of Canaan they were unusual, and denoted the Divine displeasure. Thus the advancement of ignorant and wicked men to dignity and authority, especially in Israel, was ominous, and foreboded the pouring out of divine judgments upon the nation.—'The blending together of summer and winter, would not cause a greater disorder in the natural world, than the disposal of honour to bad men, does in the moral world.' (Bp. Patrick.) strife belonging not to him, is like one that taketh a dog by the ears.

18 As a mad man, who casteth <sup>s</sup>firebrands, arrows, and death;

unmerited anathemas, imprecations, and calumnies, will not eventually harm us; but will alight on those who uttered them.

V. 3. The whip and the bridle are needful for the proper management of the horse or the ass, and every creature must be dealt with according to its nature; but the nature of careless and profligate sinners is such, that they will not be ruled by reason and persuasion, and therefore severe treatment must be their portion.

V. 4, 5. 'Consent not to his doings.'—'Reprove him as the matter requireth.'—It is highly improper to answer a fool, in his own foolish manner; to meet him on his own ground; to retort on him his scurrilous, abusive, impertinent language; to enter on disputes with him, and answer his vain cavils or objections; or to treat his folly and impiety, as if it were worthy of notice or refutation. This would be doing him an honour, to which he is not entitled; and by thus descending to his level, his opponent would insensibly get into his trifling, contentious, railing spirit, and become like unto him. But it is important to consider the character and intention of men; and to level an answer against a foolish and impertinent railer and caviller, with such poignancy, and force of argument, as may admit of no reply; and so to adapt the remarks to the man, and address them to his conscience, as may best expose his ignorance or malice, stop his mouth, and end the debate at once. A notorious profligate, scoffer, or infidel, has no just claim to that respectful treatment, to which a more modest and decent enquirer is entitled: for this would feed his vanity and augment his self-importance. But a decided and pointed answer to his captious queries, that manifests the ignorance and wickedness which dictated them, forms the proper method of dealing with him. So that we should not answer a foolish man in a foolish manner; but we should answer him in a way, suited to expose his folly, to mortify his pride, and to prevent others from being deluded by him. Of this we have very many beautiful examples in the history of Jesus Christ. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 6. He who employs an ignorant and worthless man in any important business, as it were, cuts off his own feet, puts himself to much pain, disables himself, and retards his affairs; and he can expect nothing but disappointment, vexation, and damage in abundance, as the recompense of his folly. The princes of this world sometimes employ such envoys: but the Lord never sends those, as his messengers, who do not understand or are not able to deliver their message, or whose foolish and wicked conduct is an habitual disgrace to him; though many such wear the garb, and appear in the character, of his messengers.

V. 7. 'Lift ye up the legs of the lame, what doth it help him?' The clause is generally understood, of a lame man's affectation of agility;—though indeed he never moves so ungracefully, as when he affects to be nimble; and thus a foolish man never appears to so great a disadvantage, as when he pretends to wisdom. He either shews his ignorance and folly, by speaking things false and inapplicable to the occasion: or the wise remarks, which he hath picked up, are so contrary to his own general conduct and converse, that they render him the more contemptible. (Note, xvii. 7.)

V. 8. He, who fixes a stone in a sling, probably prepares mischief for somebody, perhaps for himself: so does he, who confers authority on a foolish and wicked man, or helps to advance his reputation. It is like putting a sword or a loaded pistol into a madman's hand.

V. 9. A drunken man will heedlessly lay hold on thorns, or other sharp things, which run into his hand; and perhaps be insensible to it, till he becomes sober, and the wound begins to rankle. Thus a parable, or wise observation, is so ill managed by a fool, that it wounds himself by exposing his wickedness, and increasing his condemnation: and though he may not be sensible of it at present, yet he will be, when he shall be condemned out of his own mouth and by his own doctrine.

V. 10. This proverb may either declare how the Lord, the Creator of all men, will deal with sinners, according to the degrees and aggravations of their guilt; whether they be ignorant, careless, or presumptuous; or how the great and powerful among men, who do so much towards forming the manners of all others, ought to act. Instead of honouring and employing worthless and wicked men, they ought to disgrace and punish them according to their deserts. The margin reads it; A great man grieveth all, and he hireth the fool, he hireth also the transgressors. But the sense may thus be more clearly expressed, 'when he hireth the fool, and hireth the transgressors.'

V. 11. This greedy animal, which alone is observed to act in the manner described, is the loathsome emblem of those sinners, who return to their vices, after they have in various ways smarted for them, and been made conscious of their folly in them: they seem to be weary of their sins, and to repent of them; but they soon shake off the conviction, and return to them with more greediness than ever. Do any feel disgusted at the allusion? Let them remember, that the emblem is far less filthy than the thing denoted by it; and that the whole race of animals does not afford any thing so debasing, as not to be far outdone by the excesses of libertines, and drunkards, and gluttons. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 12. If the sottish person above described, 'be not altogether insensible of his folly, nor refuse admonition; there is more hope of his amendment, than of his, who takes himself to be so wise and virtuous, that he despises his betters, and thinks himself above instruction.' (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 13–16. (Notes, xix. 24. xxii. 13.) 'He who hath no mind to labour, never wants pretences for his idleness.' (Bp. Patrick.)—Two words are used here, both of which are translated lion; but the former is generally supposed to signify a most fierce and large lion. Lions, however, are seldom to be met with in the streets; and are generally in their dens, when man is required to attend to his work.—As the door moves on, but not from, its hinges; so the slothful move on, but not from their beds; or, at best, they make no progress in any employment. The most needful exertion is grievous to them; ease is their chief good, the preservation of it for the present, is their chief wisdom: and whilst they sacrifice to this base end the interests of time and eternity; they foolishly deem themselves wiser than all those, who render a reason why they should bestir themselves, and attend to their business and duty.

V. 17. To take a part in quarrels, in which men have no concern; or even zealously to interfere to settle disputes and litigations, where neither party is disposed to take their advice, is a great imprudence, and is sure to lead them into many difficulties. It is, as if a man should seize a fierce dog as he passed him by the ears, by which he could expect no other than to be bitten; and it is hard to say, whether it would be safest to try to hold him, or to let him go.

V. 18, 19. A madman, without intentional malice, may do immense mischief in a very little time, by firing houses, or murdering those whom he meets; and it may be an entertainment for him. But he, who, without the excuse of madness, diverts himself with imposing upon his neighbour, and leading him into errors, contentions, and trouble, merely that he may laugh at his distresses, is a man of a most mischievous disposition, and worthy of the severest punishment, or the closest confinement.—The word rendered madman seems to mean one who feigns himself mad; and then the propriety of the similitude would lie in the false pretences, under which each of the persons did the mischief. One pretends to be mad; the other, to be in jest: but this makes no amends to the injured party.

V. 20, 21. 'Look on him as an incendiary, that carries tales, and whispers false stories; and expel him from the family: for as the fire will go out, if you take away the wood that feeds it; so will quarrels and contentions cease, when he is thrust out of doors that blows up the flame.' (Bp. Patrick.) (Note, xxii. 10.)

more fitted for the purposes of imposition. Thus when men gloss over their malicious and selfish intentions with warm professions of affection, they become the more dangerous deceivers.—Some indeed interpret burning lips to mean passionate and malicious language; but in that case the potsheerd appears without disguise.

V. 24—27. These verses seem to be connected together, and likewise with the preceding verse.—‘He that harbours enmity in his heart, pretends friendship with his lips, (or, ‘shall be discovered by his lips.’)—Do not credulously listen to his flatteries and professions of regard and esteem; (in which he will often overact his part;) for he conceals many base designs within. But wait a while, without committing thyself; and if his hatred be covered with deceit, his wickedness will ere long be publicly exposed; he will fall into the pit he hath bestowed pains to dig for thee, and be crushed by the stone which he meant to roll upon thee.’ (Marg. Ref.)

V. 28. Calumny is the offspring of malice, and an open declaration of enmity; and the slanderer, instead of pitying the man whom he hath wounded by his lies, becomes more inveterate in his hatred of him, through fear of being exposed, or feeling the weight of his vengeance. Yet the flatterer is the more dangerous character: his poison is more insinuating and unsuspected; and it tends to increase pride, and to inflame the passions, and to prompt a man to those undertakings, for which he is not qualified, and which prove ruinous to him.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—16. When ungodly and unqualified men are advanced to authority, we are called on to prepare for correction, and to repent of our sins. But, if our ways please God, we need not fear either the oppressor's iron rod, or the persecutor's impious anathema, or the enraged imprecations of those who delight in cursing. In such cases, let us hold our peace, keep on our way, and trust in the Lord; and then we shall be blessed in him, let who will menace, curse, or revile. The great God, that formed all things, will recompense such men, in due time, according to their folly and wickedness; and if the kings of the earth, instead of copying his example, and treating infidels and profligates with marked disapprobation, will caress and honour them, they will be sure to prove a hindrance and a detriment to all their undertakings; and what mischief they will do to others cannot be ascertained; for “as he that bindeth a stone in a sling, so is he that giveth honour to a fool.”—It behoves every one to take warning, and not “be like unto the horse, or mule, that have no understanding;” for then, severe discipline will be requisite, and great plagues remain for those that are obstinate in impiety. But whilst we follow after wisdom ourselves, we shall constantly need her counsels how to behave towards foolish and impious men. In language which the superficial reader may perhaps deem contradictory, the divine instructor marks out that line of conduct to us, which afterwards, in human nature, he most perfectly observed. The disciple of Christ, keeping his example in view, will never answer the impertinence, the boasts, the scoffs, or the blasphemies of fools, in such a manner as to become like unto them; but, keeping at a distance from wrath and railing, from levity and ostentation, and from a boisterous disdainful style or manner; he will know how to answer their folly with brevity and decision, so as to silence them, and put them to shame, when they expect to triumph and be applauded; that they may neither be wise in their own conceit, nor deceive the ignorant by their empty but confident pretensions. But he that would attain to this useful endowment, must begin by practising what he has learned: otherwise the wisest and most pointed observations will be as the unequal legs of the lame, or as a parable in the mouth of a fool: they will give those against whom they are directed, an opportunity to retort, ‘Physician, heal thyself;’ and to call the attention of the hearers, to the inconsistency of this or the other part of their conduct, with their own doctrine: thus they will only expose and wound themselves; nay, it will turn to their condemnation, that they have not profited by their own preaching. Nor must this practice be a mere partial, or external matter: for until the love of sinful pleasures and advantages be mortified, and the love of God and holiness implanted in our hearts, we shall still be numbered amongst the foolish: and, notwithstanding convictions, and partial reformations, shall be ready, when tempted, to return to folly, as the dog to his vomit. Pride also must be peculiarly guarded against; for it is evidenced by facts, that no careless, profligate, or ignorant unbeliever is so hopeless, as the man who is wise in his own conceit. Thus self-sufficient professors of evangelical doctrines, and pharisaical formalists, and philosophical infidels, are, of all other descriptions of men, the least likely to repent and obey the gospel: and the instances of conversion are more unfrequent among them than among publicans and harlots; because they are more wise in their own conceit; and, thinking that they see, they are at rest in their tenfold darkness. Nor are any persons more likely to be taken in this snare, than those who are slothful in the concerns of their souls. They take the most important matters upon trust, or are satisfied with a superficial enquiry: their sloth retains them in ignorance and error, and their ignorance fosters their self-conceit. Nay, they think themselves extremely wise, in having hit upon a method of quieting their consciences, without renouncing their ease, interest, or indulgence; and they ignorantly flatter themselves, that they know how to serve God and mammon, and to get to heaven without self-denial, striving, or labour. Some of this stamp exclaim, ‘All this is legal, we must be saved by grace alone: why tell you us of diligence, obedience, and good works?’ Others rest in a formal profession; they deny not, that such and such things should be done; but there is always some lion in the way at the present. They cannot be quite at rest in their negligence: but they can no more find in their hearts to renounce it, than the sluggard can to leave his bed. They have a scanty round of outward observances, in which they move as the door on its hinges, but they get no further; they are ingenious at devising excuses for neglecting every duty which would cost them any thing; nay, they pride themselves in this ingenuity: they starve their souls, because they will not bestow pains to feed them, though the bread of life is set before them; and yet, though their conduct be so irrational and ruinous, they will deem themselves wiser than all that would teach them better; and will be offended with every one who refuses to flatter them in this fond conceit of themselves.

V. 17—28. True wisdom is always attended with humility and diligence: and it will direct a man, in the most difficult circumstances. He who truly seeks this gift from God, by fervent prayers, will know when to attempt the blessed work of a peacemaker, and when to stand aloof from contentions which do not belong to him. He will be far from deceiving, or injuring, any one, and then saying “Am I not in sport?” For it is diabolical to delight in mischief: it is the part of a madman to cast about firebrands, arrows, and death; and they, who tell lies to make themselves merry, will easily be tempted to tell lies to make themselves rich; so that he, who regards the word of God, will abhor all falsehood; but that most, which is most mischievous. The lies of the tale-bearer will appear to him peculiarly aggravated; for little bickerings in families and neighbourhoods would generally cease in a short time, did not these officious incendiaries, from direct love of contention, bring wood and coals, to kindle and keep up the fire. Thus their words are irreparably mischievous, and their characters completely odious. The Christian, no doubt, desires to hope the best of every one, as far as facts will admit of it: but his candour is not folly; he must judge of men by the general tenor of their conduct; and if they are evidently selfish, envious, or malicious, he cannot value their fulsome professions of affection, and the crafty dissimulation by which they cover over their wickedness, the deceit which is harboured within, and their purposes of hatred and malice. Indeed, whatever is excessive is suspicious; and though Christians should be harmless as doves, they need to be wise as serpents; that they may not, by believing fair words, sanction or receive detriment from such, as have seven abominations in their hearts. For whilst the open calumniator is a bitter and cruel enemy, the insidious flatterer is still more to be dreaded and shunned; for he will stab a man, as Joab did Amasa, whilst he salutes him, and betray him, as Judas did Jesus, with a kiss. But let such men remember, that he whose hatred is covered with deceit, his wickedness will be shewed before the assembled world; and they, who devise mischief for others, will themselves be overwhelmed by it, and sink into it for ever.

NOTES.

CHAP. XXVII. V. 1. ‘Be not so confident of thy present power, riches, or any thing else, as to grow presumptuous, and brag what thou wilt do or enjoy hereafter, for thou canst not be secure of this very day; which may produce something, for any thing thou knowest, that shall spoil all thy designs, and frustrate all thy expectations, which thou hast for to-morrow.’ (Bp. Patrick.) — ‘Delay not the time, but take the occasion when it is offered.’ (Marg. Ref.)

V. 2. (Note, xxv. 27.) ‘Be not so blinded by self-love as to praise thyself, but take care to do praiseworthy things, which will force commendation even from strangers and foreigners.’ (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 3. ‘What is heavier than lead? and what is the name of it but a fool? Sand and salt, and a mass of iron, is easier to bear than a man without understanding.’ (Ecclesiasticus.) (Note, xxix. 9.) The effects of a foolish and wicked man's ungodly rage are more intolerable than the heaviest burden, or the hardest labour.

V. 4. Violent passion and deep resentment are often very cruel and outrageous, and produce dreadful effects; yet the one is soon over, and the other may be mollified by prudent concessions and repeated favours; but envy is excited (not by affronts or misconduct, but) by the too conspicuous talents or performances of one who is considered as a competitor; by the praises bestowed on him, and the favour shewn him; and the more wisely and well the envied person behaves, the more will envy increase in the breast of his jealous rival. There is therefore little to be done to abate its force, and there is no standing against it, when the envious person is in authority; and it is often best to retire out of the reach of its effects, as David did from the envy of Saul.—The original word for envy, is often rendered jealousy; and the passion is the same, though the object or occasion be different. It is a spirit of rivalry, or competition, either for the favour of an individual, or for public applause, or some other object; mingled with haughty indignation, malignity, and enmity, at being supplanted, undervalued, and eclipsed; or even envenomed suspicions that this is the case, or fears that it will soon become so. When the word is used concerning God, it denotes his holy zeal for the honour of his own name, and determination to punish those who give his glory to another. It is therefore often translated zeal, and then it is either a fervent regard for the glory of God, shewn in a holy manner consistent with love to all men; or a proud and eager desire of a man's own honour, or that of his party, manifested with bitterness, adopting unhallowed means of securing success, and thus degenerating into envy of the worst kind; even such as instigated the crucifiers of Christ, and the antichristian persecutors of his church in all subsequent ages; and as excites fierce controversies, base slanders, and deep-rooted malice, between bigots and zealots of different descriptions.

V. 5. Plain and faithful rebukes, prudently given, are better effects of friendship than that excessive tenderness and respect, which connives at a man's faults, for fear of paining or offending him; so that open rebuke is not only preferable to secret enmity, but even to secret love, which in this respect is of no real service to the beloved person.

V. 6. The skilful and faithful surgeon wounds, in order to preserve life, or recover the patient. He pains by cutting; but he never cuts wider or deeper than he judges necessary. Such is the conduct of the faithful, affectionate, and discreet reproof; such are the corrections of our heavenly Friend. But the flatterer, and false friend, who cloaks his malice under the language and demeanour of excessive love, only aims to deceive and ruin us.—The latter clause is variously rendered: 'The kisses of him that hates are frequent.' They "are to be deprecated." 'We had need to pray him to forbear, and pray God to preserve us from being too credulous.' (Bp. Patrick.) 'They are pleasant.' (Old Translation.) Expressions of kindness, though excessive, are so agreeable, that most men prefer them to plain-dealing; so that the fulsome flatterer is generally caressed as a friend, and the faithful reprover shunned as an enemy, to the unspeakable detriment of mankind.

V. 7. Abundance and excess spoil the appetite, and prevent the luxurious from relishing any of their delicacies. But he who labours hard, and fares meanly, and eats not till he is hungry, relishes the most unsavoury morsel; which gives poverty an advantage as to real enjoyment, almost sufficient to counterbalance all its disadvantages.—In like manner the proud and self-sufficient disdain the provisions of the gospel; but "the poor in spirit," and they who "hunger and thirst after righteousness," can find much comfort from every part of the word of God, and from the meanest book, or sermon, which accords to it.

V. 8. The bird that forsakes its nest, leaves the place where it had found repose, warmth, and shelter, and thus is exposed to various hardships and dangers. Thus every man has his proper place in society, in which he may be safe and comfortable; but when, out of levity, discontent, avarice, or ambition, he rashly quits it, he generally changes imaginary for real disquietudes. In like manner, they who are never easy at home, and in their own families and employments, seldom prosper, or are happy any where; and they who affect to appear like their superiors, generally bring themselves into difficulties. There may be cases in which it is a man's duty and prudence to change his situation, or employment; but then he will do it upon good grounds, and with deliberation. Every man hath calls from home; but a prudent man will be glad to return, when the end of his absence is effected. But an unsettled, roving, dissatisfied spirit; a turn for scheming and shifting from one place, or undertaking to another; an aversion to a man's own situation or business, are extremely dangerous and sinful.

V. 9. The affectionate and faithful counsel of a cordial friend is more refreshing to a man in trouble, than any ointment or perfumes could be to his senses.—The verse, however, has been rendered, perhaps more literally, "as ointment and perfume gladden the heart: so the sweetness of a friend does every one, more than hearty counsel." An affectionate manner, though of less intrinsic value, is so generally more acceptable, than the most prudent and sincere good advice, given rudely; that, in order to do good, the sweetness of the manner, as well as the integrity and faithfulness of the intention, and the wisdom of the counsel, should be carefully attended to.

V. 10. It is generally most advisable to cultivate the friendship of those who have shewn themselves attached to a man by inclination and esteem; and of those who have been the friends of his father and family. Such are generally more to be depended on in trying circumstances than the nearest relations. And, indeed, prudent, pious, and honest men may expect to obtain friends in the neighbourhood where they live, who are nearer at hand, and more ready to assist, than relations, who are perhaps as far off in affection as in their places of abode. 'As a man that is closely joined to us in affection, is better than one of our nearest kindred, whose heart is not knit to us: so a neighbour near at hand, is better than either friend or brother, who is so far off that we may perish before he come to our assistance.' (Bp. Patrick.)—"God is a present help in time of trouble;" but saints and angels, to whom numbers pray, must, as to most of them, be at best the friend or brother that is far off.

V. 11. This may be intended as the address of an affectionate parent to his son, whose prudent conduct would both gladden his heart, and furnish him with an answer to those who reproached him as negligent of the duties of that relation. But wisdom also is justified of her children, from the reproaches of her enemies: and the good conduct of professed Christians supplies the most effectual answer to those, who reproach the gospel as tending to licentiousness.

V. 12. (Note, xxii. 3.)

V. 13. (Note, xx. 15.)

V. 14. Excessive commendations, and professions of gratitude and friendship, are always to be suspected as insincere and selfish. They are also of bad consequence: they put a man off his guard, and tend to give force to his passions; and they excite envy, and set men to hunt after his faults, that they may blacken that character which is enhanced so much above their level. So that, he who makes it his great business, (as if he rose early in the morning for that single purpose,) to lavish praises on any one whom he calls his friend or benefactor; and who bestows pains to proclaim his excellences and bounty to every body, will not be looked upon by a wise man, much more favourably, than if he had traduced, or cursed him: nay, he will think the friendship of so injudicious or designing a man, a disgrace rather than an honour to him.—Some interpret the clause, "rising early in the morning," of too great haste in lavishly commending. 'There is nothing more dangerous, than to cry up men too soon, before they be sufficiently tried; for this, instead of doing them service, many times proves their ruin.' (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 15, 16. (xix. 13.) Litigious neighbours sometimes excite contentions, which resemble a hasty shower that is soon over; but a contentious wife is as the constant dropping through a decayed roof in a very rainy day; so that a man can neither keep himself dry out of doors or in the house. The utmost meekness and prudence will be found, in such a case, insufficient to conceal her unseemly behaviour; however a man might be disposed to connive at, or hide, her faults, her own unruly temper will betray them, and render their disagreements the common topic of conversation; even as it is impossible to conceal the boisterous wind; and as the fragrant of the ointment would make him known, who had anointed his hands with it, whatever pains he took to hide it.—'The best way for a man to avoid the trouble of a bad wife is, not to choose one for his consort because she is rich, or because she is beautiful, only; but because she is like him in humour, inclination, and condition,' &c. (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 17. Iron is often most effectually used to sharpen iron; and thus friends of correspondent dispositions whet each other's ingenuity; suggest useful hints and good counsels; encourage one another against despondency, and excite such as grow slack; and thus they help one another forward in every useful attempt. (Marg. Ref.)—The advantages of society and conversation are thus emphatically shewn. Indeed, it has been observed, that the most useful inventions have originated from the collision of men's thoughts, when earnestly engaged in conversation.

V. 18. The labour of planting and pruning the fig-tree, is recompensed by the sweet fruit that it yields: thus menial servants may obtain solid reputation and advantage, by attending diligently to the duties of their situation, though obscure and laborious.—'He that faithfully defends his master's person or reputation, and takes care his estate is not wasted, shall in due time be largely rewarded.' (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 19. The reflection from the clear water or mirror corresponds to the face of him that looks in it: thus do the hearts of men to each other. The judgments, dispositions, desires, and imaginations of sinners are much the same; or only varied by constitution, habit, education, and rank in life. Godly people are very much of the same judgment and disposition, as to the main things, in proportion to their degree of grace and information. The opposition between conscience and inclination is much the same, in one wicked man, as in another; except as some are more ignorant, or more hardened than others. The conflict betwixt corrupt nature and grace is similar in all believers; and their varying joys, sorrows, hopes, fears, and other experiences have a surprising coincidence; so that he, who well knows and watches his own heart, will not greatly be a stranger to those of other men; but will often so speak to their secret thoughts and purposes, that he will appear to have received some special information about them. In order then to know human nature, we should first study our own hearts, in all the variety of situations in which we are successively placed. —This proverb, however, is variously interpreted: —‘As a man may know what kind of face he hath, if he will look into the water: so he may know what kind of man he is, if he will examine his conscience,’ (Castalia.) This is an important instruction; but it does not seem the sense of the maxim. —‘A man may see himself, while he looks upon other men, as well as know other men by considering his own inclinations.’ (Lord Bacon's interpretation stated by Bp. Patrick.) Indeed this seems the true interpretation, provided another idea be suggested. —‘There is no difference between man and man by nature; but only the grace of God maketh the difference.’

V. 20. The grave still yawns to receive the bodies of men, though it has devoured innumerable millions; and the place of separate spirits, for their souls; nay, the pit of destruction is still open to receive the wicked. Thus insatiable are the senses, appetites, and hearts of men; curiosity, thirst for novelty, variety, and ornament; covetousness, ambition, sensuality, even blood-thirstiness, are all insatiable, and grow more craving by indulgence; they still devour, and demand more and more. (xxx. 15, 16.)

V. 21. The characters of men may be in some measure known, by considering what sort of persons most commend them: but more decidedly by observing the effects which praise produces on them. If a man, when greatly applauded, grow insolent and assuming; if he affect state, and become negligent or above his work? and be disappointed and peevish, when not commended; and if this be habitual to him, it proves him to be dross, which will not endure the furnace. But if applause render a man more circumspect in his walk, and diligent in his duty; if he remain contented in his former situation, and easy in performing obscure services; if he continue modest in his deportment, and affable to men of low estate; and if this appear unaffected and habitual, it marks him gold: and he who can endure this furnace, and grow purer in it, will not be injured by any other. There are many degrees between the two extremes; and a man's character must rise or fall, in the judgment of wise men, according as he approaches to one or the other of them.

V. 22. The straw and chaff may be separated from the wheat by thrashing and winnowing. Nay, the husks may be beaten off, by braying it in a mortar. But no afflictions, or punishments, however severe, will cure a hardened and impious profligate of his folly and wickedness. His heart and life are all of a piece, and no human power can make any separation. —They who argue that the miseries of hell will mend the disposition of impenitent sinners, and prepare them for a release, should consider this proverb carefully; and they should remember, that the new-creating power of God's grace is alone effectual to produce this change; and that the torments of hell are never mentioned among the appointed means of grace.

V. 23—27. These verses recommend the advantages of private life; and shew that diligence in rural employments, and the plenty which is obtained by it, are more conducive to true happiness, than the unstable and uneasy, though splendid, possessions of wealth and authority. Riches are very precarious, and kingdoms are often transferred from one family to another. But he who hath an estate, or farm, in the country, and diligently attends to it, will see his provisions springing out of the earth, to repay his toil; and sensibly coming from the hand of God. He will have suitable and sufficient food and raiment, for himself, and his family, and domestics; and though it be homely and frugal, it will be wholesome and comfortable; and attended with little care, risk, or temptation. And he, who is thus provided for, and has a contented mind, needs not, and will not, envy the king on his throne, being far safer and happier than he.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—12. In this uncertain world we “know not what a day may bring forth.” We may be deprived of our limbs, senses, faculties, or lives, or experience the most distressing changes in our circumstances and connections, before another day be gone. We should never then presume upon to-morrow: or boast what we will be, or do, hereafter; or postpone any needful work to a future time. Numbers have perished through procrastination; numbers with declining faculties, and drawing near the close of life, have lamented their lost opportunities of usefulness. Whilst the simple pass on, and are punished for their neglect of the one thing needful; every prudent man will foresee these and similar evils, and take proper measures to avoid them. And as life is so short and fleeting; and our present conduct has so intimate a connection with our eternal condition; it is inconsistent with true wisdom, to spend our time and thoughts, in devising needless changes in our outward condition; or to wander from our proper place and business, in pursuit of imaginary advantages. Rather let us seek to the Lord to give us a contented mind, in the situation which he hath assigned us, and a heart to delight in our present duty: that, having chosen him for our portion, and being humbly sensible how much our comforts exceed our deservings; and applying ourselves diligently to the business of our station, we may be able to get rid of all roving desires. In order to this, counsel, and even rebuke are often necessary; (even as medicines and surgical operations, though nauseous and painful, are for our bodies;) and they should be considered as the most disinterested and valuable friends, who venture our displeasure, by faithfully seeking our highest and most durable good. Indeed, no wise and cordial friend will “suffer sin upon us,” by neglecting the needful proof of love: in their better judgment they know it to be salutary; and though it wounds, and pains, yet “faithful are the wounds of a friend;” and afterwards at least, all sound characters will be better pleased with it, than with the reserved and less cordial affection of those, who would have left them to go on in their errors and sins. They, who have such friends as these (and the pious children of pious parents will generally be so favoured,) should be very careful not to forsake or lose them: and it is much wiser to endeavour by good behaviour to attach those, who may be ready to help us in trouble from genuine affection, than to apply to rich relations, in whom the tie of blood is seldom so powerful as regard to interest. In every case we should endeavour to win upon the esteem of all around us; and to shun envy, as much as we can consistently with our duty. It is very easy to create ourselves enemies, and to exasperate them; but it is more difficult to pacify their wrath, which is often cruel and outrageous in its effects. We ought not indeed to desire the friendship of foolish and wicked men: yet we should be very careful not to provoke them; for, not being to be mollified by concessions, or convinced by arguments, their wrath will be found more heavy than the sand, or the ponderous rock, and will bear down all before it. But envy is still more malignant, being rendered more vehement by that very wisdom and goodness, which tend to disarm every other species of resentment. We must not, however, cease to act wisely, or to do good, in order to avoid even envy; but we should shun ostentation and competition: and whilst we study to behave in such a manner, that strangers, and all impartial persons, may be constrained to applaud our good works; we should not only not praise ourselves, but not even needlessly mention our services, or fish for commendation. But, alas, high commendations and warm professions of affection, though nothing is done to prove them sincere, are almost universally more welcome than plain-dealing, even when attended by the most indisputable proofs of genuine and cordial friendship. The ointment and perfume, the sweetness of the manner, even in a flatterer, and one not credited as sincere, outweighs in the scales of human intercourse, the solid bullion of cordial friendship in an uncouth garb, and hearty counsel not gracefully imparted. In like manner, how rarely do we rise above the fascinating impositions of the world? Who can help estimating men's happiness by their wealth and prosperity? Yet the single indisputable fact, that the full soul loatheth the honeycomb; but to the hungry soul every bitter thing is sweet,” is sufficient, even as to present enjoyment, to subvert that whole system, and to make the sated epicure envy the neighbouring healthy but indigent cottager.

V. 13—27. It becomes a Christian to shun all indiscreet connections and engagements, and especially to stand aloof from those who run themselves into difficulties by extravagant expenses and vicious indulgences. Indeed, few are more lavish in praising their imprudent benefactors, or, rather, the dupes of their artifices, than these unhappy men are, so long as further supplies are hoped for; but none more severe in their sarcasms and calumnies, when the patience of their friends is exhausted, and they can no longer be imposed on. —But, in all cases, we should be very shy of those friends, real or pretended, who are very loud and lavish in their commendations and professions, remembering that the kisses of an enemy are deceitful. And if they do not mean ill, their excessive praise is disgraceful to us, if we shew ourselves pleased with it and with them, and exposes us to envy and hatred. But here a distinction will appear between the man possessed of superficial endowments, and him who has attained unto solid wisdom and piety. The former, when commendations are bestowed, will grasp for more, and often vainly think of extorting them by his exorbitant demands: and he will aspire after the highest places, and become overbearing, in proportion to his popularity, or reputation. But the humble Christian will not crowd sail in such a treacherous gale of favour; he will fear, and provide against a storm; he will be more careful to deserve, than to receive, commendation; he will yield to those who appear disposed to vie with him, and recede from every pretension which may excite envy, or give umbrage. Indeed, he will desire to behave in such a manner as to be a credit and comfort to his friends and family; and to adorn the gospel, and “by well doing to put to silence the ignorance of foolish men.” but he will not be a zealous candidate for reputation of any kind. It is enough to pass through life quietly and usefully: we should, therefore, watch against those malignant passions in ourselves, as well as against their effects in others. We should pray that we may be, and feel thankful if we are, preserved from the grief and disgrace of domestic contests: and we should seek for patience to bear every affliction which the Lord may lay upon us in a proper manner. Whatever our trials may be, by waiting on our great and gracious Master, we shall find solace and support, and, in due time, we shall be honoured. In this frame of mind, he who diligently tends his flock and herds; or takes care of the fig-tree, or olive-yard; or is faithful as a servant or labourer, and abides in his calling, because it is the will of God, will be accepted of him in all he does. He will be an useful and respectable member of the community; his real wants will be supplied, and incentives to pride, luxury, and excess, will be mercifully withheld; and he will escape manifold snares and temptations, to which his superiors are exposed. Nor is it an empty boast, that such a man has a more solid and stable enjoyment of life than the king upon his throne, or the richest of his subjects; for he hath less uncertainty and anxiety, and fewer fears, cares, and enemies, than they. So very vain are earthly possessions, except as they are employed to do good with! The friendship and esteem, also, which men in private stations obtain by good behaviour, are far more desirable than the encomiums and professions that accompany wealth and power. Piety, integrity, and prudence, produce reciprocal and sincere affection. Friends, thus united, sharpen one another in every good work: they are cordial, pleasant, and experimental counsellors to each other; they share each other's comforts, and soften each other's sorrows, by tender sympathy. But we might as reasonably expect to fill hell and destruction till they could hold no more, as to satisfy the heart of man with created good, when nothing but the enjoyment of God himself for ever, can fill the capacities and desires of our rational nature. —Happy, then, are they, and only they, who trust in him, and love him. But there always have been numbers who receive no benefit from the greatest mercies, or from afflictions, however sharp and tedious; and who continue the plague and scandal of all related to them, till they are driven away in their wickedness. As our hearts by nature answer to their's exactly, we have the more cause to be thankful, if the Lord hath made us to differ by his grace; and we should pity and pray for those who are yet left to themselves. Finally, let us apply ourselves to the instructive study of human nature, by carefully watching our own hearts, and comparing them with the word of God, and the state of the world and the church around us. Thus we shall learn how to answer every one, and behave to every one, as their characters and circumstances require.

NOTES.

CHAP. XXVIII. V. 1. Wicked men often appear very courageous; and when they are heated with wine, or excited by resentment, ambition, or other vehement passions, they face danger with great intrepidity; nay, they may have an habitual mechanical courage, so long as reflection is excluded, and the conscience is stupefied through ignorance, error, inattention, or excess. Yet, when any thing arouses the consciousness of guilt, and the thoughts of a future reckoning, their courage fails, and they become exceedingly timorous; and many of them experience those terrors which they would be ashamed to acknowledge, especially when they are sick, or in solitude. But the upright Christian, whose sins are pardoned, and whose conscience is at peace, is most bold when most cool and reflecting; a sudden alarm may discompose him exceedingly; but let him have time for recollection, faith, and prayer, and his courage gathers strength; and the feeblest true believer will not be finally terrified from his duty by the frown of a tyrant, or the menace of a fiery furnace, as the examples of the martyrs abundantly shew.

V. 2. 'The state of the commonwealth is oftentimes changed.' Either many rival princes, whose discordant claims desolate the land by civil wars; or, many, in quick succession, being cut off by traitors and usurpers one after another, or removed before any thing can be brought to an establishment. Compare the history of Israel, after the revolt of the ten tribes, with that of Judah, under the princes of David's line; and read the history of Asa, Jehoshaphat, Jotham, Hezekiah, and Josiah, as the best comment on the latter part of the verse.

V. 3. Extravagant spendthrifts, who have reduced themselves to poverty, and involved themselves in debts, often make interest to get into places of trust and authority; and then their oppression, (the result of poverty, rapacity, and profusion,) resembles an inundation, which entirely desolates the country, and leaves the wretched inhabitants not the least subsistence. In various ways indigent persons obtain opportunities of oppressing the poor; and their extortion is more absolute and unfeeling than that of a richer man, who would not think such petty gains worth his notice, as the needy oppressor stoops to. A succession of indigent governors and officers in remote provinces, who know that their time will be short, and are determined to make the most of it; and who deem themselves secure from justice, by the distance of the place, and the power of bribing high, which they purchase by extortion, often give a melancholy comment on this proverb, and a wretched demonstration of the impolicy and iniquity of preferring such men. The ancients expressed the sense of this proverb, under the fable of two horse-leeches, one full, and the other hungry; and by two sponges, one wet, and the other dry.—'The parable comprehends in it a profitable instruction, both to princes and people; to princes, that they commit not the government of provinces, or places of charge, to indigent and indebted persons; and to the people, that they suffer not their kings to struggle with too much want.' (Lord Bacon.)

V. 4. Wicked men excuse one another's faults, and extol one another's supposed virtues, in order to keep themselves in countenance, and their own consciences in peace. But upright men, who want no such apologies, will not make them for others. They would candidly allow of what is good, and make the best of what is dubious; but they cannot call scandalous vices by soft names, or give those a good character who are evidently wicked: nay, they deem themselves bound to protest against iniquity, and to use all their power to check its progress.

V. 5. Men's unbridled passions and wicked actions pervert their judgments, and cloud their understandings, till they "call evil good, and good evil;" so that they are not able to know right from wrong, when their own conduct or interest is concerned. But he who seeks the favour, and desires to do the will of God, will be led into the knowledge of all useful truth. 'They that are true-hearted to God, and conscionable in their ways, have so much light from God's Spirit, that they know both what they should do, and how they should perform it.' (Bp. Hall.) (Marg. Ref.)

V. 6. (Note, xix. 1.) 'A poor man, walking in truth, is better than the rich man of a lie; or, a rich liar.' (Septuagint.)

V. 7. The young man, who obeys God, by obeying his parents in all things lawful, shews his wisdom: but he that spends his time and money in feeding gluttons, or feasting epicures, and in riotous living, does what he can to disgrace his father, as well as to show his own folly, and reduce himself to abject misery. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 8. (Notes, xiii. 22, 23. Job xxvii. 13—23.) Under the terms usury and increase, or unjust gain, all exactions and oppressions are meant. (Note, Ex. xxii. 25.)

V. 9. 'He that refuses to hearken unto God, and obey his law, deceives himself, if he thinks by his prayers to please him, or to make an amends for his crimes; for God will be so far from hearkening to him, that he will abominate such prayers, as tend to nothing but to make God a partner with him in his sins.' (Bp. Patrick.) Such prayer is not of faith; for that is grounded on God's word or law, which the wicked contemn. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 10. Ungodly men are often very zealous in enticing such as profess religion into sin or error. Thus they aim to keep themselves in countenance; they shew their enmity to the truth, and find an occasion of treating it with ridicule and contempt; and in short, they are the factors of Satan, and inspired with his disposition. But their success in their misery, and will ensure their more aggravated condemnation: while such as are upright in heart will either withstand their temptations, or be recovered from the snare; and so inherit good, even eternal good.

V. 11. Rich men are so much complimented and flattered, and are so accustomed to have every thing their own way, that they are very apt to conceit themselves as much superior to others in understanding as in affluence: and this is especially the case with such as have risen from low stations to great riches; who are far most prone to be purse-proud. But wise and pious men readily discern their true character, through this external glare; and they will not make them their idols, oracles, or examples.

V. 12. When wise and righteous men are countenanced and preferred it is greatly to the honour of the prince, and presages glorious times. But when wicked men rise to authority, the lives, estates, and liberties of men are endangered; and good men especially seek safety in obscurity and retirement. (28.)

V. 13. The man who denies, justifies, or excuses his crimes, through pride, impenitence, or hypocrisy, will continue under condemnation, and cannot possess any durable prosperity. But he, who condemns himself, and humbly confesses his sins, in true repentance and faith, and does works meet for repentance, shall find mercy from God, however aggravated his transgressions have been. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 14. (Note 1.) Strength of faith and grace gives the zealous Christian deliverance, both from the dread of final misery, and from the fear of his fellow-creatures. But in proportion as he rises, in these respects, superior to enfeebling, distressing, and tormenting terrors; he learns more and more to reverence the majesty and glory of God; to fear even his fatherly rebukes and chastisements; to distrust his own heart; to watch against sin and temptation; to fear the effects of his own sinful passions; to walk circumspectly, as in a perilous way; and to dread, as the greatest of evils, whatever would dishonour God, and disgrace the gospel.—In these things “happy is he that feareth always:” this will render his dependence simple, his prayers fervent, his conscience tender, his peace stable, his hope lively, and his conduct consistent. But the man who is presumptuous and self-confident, and who hardens his heart against fears of every kind, shall fall into mischief.

V. 15, 16. — A prince, who is intoxicated with power, and a slave to rapacity, resentment, ambition, or sensual lusts; and who uses his power to oppress the poor, whom he ought especially to protect, shews himself to be as impolitic and foolish as he is wicked. He becomes terrible to his defenceless subjects, as a roaring lion and ranging bear to the helpless cattle. He uses his reason merely to devise mischief; and in other respects he degrades himself to the level of those ravenous beasts, which act as impelled by instinct or appetite. And he will generally be hated as a common enemy, and slain without hesitation when opportunity offers. Whereas an upright and prudent prince, who is superior to covetousness, and other selfish passions, may hope to reign long and happily, having his throne erected in the affections of his subjects. — The original word for ranging is translated empty, (Is. xxix. 8.) and is supposed here to mean hungry; as indeed wild beasts seldom range abroad but when hungry: and the Septuagint translates the word, rendered understanding, revenues. On these grounds, therefore, some interpret the latter verse of needy princes being great oppressors. But the original cannot bear this construction, without a needless conjectural amendment: 'A prince that wants understanding, and is a great oppressor, shall shorten his days: but he that hates covetousness shall prolong his days.' (Bp. Patrick.) (Marg. Ref.)

V. 17. He, that wilfully takes away the life of man, may flee whither he will, but he cannot escape the vengeance of God, or even the horrors of his accusing conscience. No one ought to conceal him, or attempt to rescue him from punishment: his life is forfeited; and if he elude the justice of man, he will only the more surely rush into the pit of destruction. The original word for doeth violence is generally rendered an oppressor; and this proverb may very properly be connected with the preceding.— If a prince, in his exactions on the poor people, proceed to shed innocent blood, (as Ahab oppressed and murdered Naboth; though he may seem out of the reach of human laws; he shall perish miserably by the judgment of God, and none shall attempt or be able to prevent it: (Marg. Ref.)

V. 18. (Notes, Ps. cxxv. 5.) 'There is no such way to be safe as to be honest and sincere for he that endeavours to preserve himself by fraud and deceit; though he can wind and turn, and hath several shifts, he thinks to save himself by, yet in one or other of them he shall perish.' (Bp. Patrick).—The last clause may be rendered, "he shall fall in one of them."

V. 19. (Note xii. 11.) 'He that tilleth his land shall be satisfied with bread; and he that followeth after vain persons, shall be satisfied with poverty.' The one shall have bread enough; and the other poverty enough. The word is the same in both clauses of the verse.

V. 20. 'He that is true to his word, and just in his dealings, shall have abundance of blessings from God, and be well spoken of by men: but he, whose eager desires make him heap up wealth by right or wrong, brings such guilt on himself, as makes him execrable unto both.' (Bp. Patrick.) Faithfulness may also include the due improvement of a man's talents; and the good wishes and fervent prayers of those, whom he thus benefits, may be numbered among his many blessings. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 21. 'All persons do not give bribes; but there is hardly any cause, wherein somewhat may not be found, to incline the mind of a judge, if respect of persons lead him. For one man shall be respected as his countryman.

another as an ill-tongued man, another as a rich man, another as a favourite, another as commended by a friend. To conclude, all is full of iniquity where respect of persons bears sway, and for a very slight matter, as it were for a bit of bread, judgment is perverted.' (Lord Bacon).—The same is at least equally true and important in the case of ministers. If, instead of the glory of God and the salvation of souls, they are influenced by respect of persons, desire of favour and popularity, or love of filthy lucre; they will be drawn aside from the line of duty by numberless considerations: and none can say to what meanness and baseness they may at length stoop.

V. 22. The avaricious man covets all he sees, grudges all that goes besides him, and all that he expends, and envies every one that is more prosperous than himself. He is not aware how precarious his ill-gotten possessions are; or how soon poverty may come upon him, and he may need help from others, though now so unwilling to bestow it on them. (Mat. 20.)

V. 23. We are so prone to self-love and pride, that the most prudent and needful rebukes are apt to create a transient displeasure. Yet upon reflection most men will have a better opinion of a faithful reprover, than of a soothing flatterer, and will shew him more favour. They, who have the most frequently made the trial, will have the fullest experimental evidence of the truth of this maxim.

Y. 24. Young people often consider themselves as, in some sense, owners of their parents' substance, and scruple not to appropriate whatever they can lay hands on. Thus they rob their parents, and say, it is no transgression to do so; whereas it is a robbery that adds ingratitude, disrespect, and disobedience to injustice, and which initiates numbers into those expensive courses, by which they at length are led to join the more infamous depredators and murderers, and so they rush forward to destruction temporal and eternal.

V. 25. The words, rendered a proud heart, signify large in mind; and the ambitious, who are actuated by vast desires and expectations of power, honour, and pre-eminence, and who are the great disturbers of mankind in public and private life, seem especially intended.—‘A man of a proud and insolent spirit, of ambitious and vast desires, is never quiet. He lives in perpetual quarrel, suits, and contentions. But he, who confiding...in the Almighty, hath a humble and contented mind, lives peaceably...and comfortably; nay, thrives, many times, and abounds in plenty of all good things.’ (Bp. Patrick.) This largeness of mind, or vast desires, differs widely from Solomon’s largeness of heart, or vast capacity, even as a humble contented mind differs from a weak capacity, or a base and grovelling spirit.

V. 26. When a man has that confidence in his own good understanding, intentions, and dispositions, that he fears no deception; and is fully satisfied that he shall act up to the purposes which he hath formed under conviction, or in sickness and danger; he proves himself to be very ignorant and foolish. He does not consider how differently he will be affected, when in health and safety, and under temptations, than he was in contrary circumstances; he trusts the worst of all deceivers, which hath cheated him a thousand times; and he might as well expect that the sea would always calm, the water always frozen, or the wind always west, because they are sometimes so. But he, who walks wisely, or circumspectly, distrusts himself, trusts in the Lord, shuns temptation, and prays continually to be upheld by the grace of God: and thus he will be delivered from those snares in which the other is entangled. A man's confidence in his own capacity and ability, for success in any undertaking, is implied in the general interpretation of trusting his own heart: but the inspired writer's strong and decided language, no doubt was intended to convey a more general and spiritual instruction.

V. 27. (Marg. Ref.) The selfish man not only refuses to look out for objects of compassion, but he turns away from those that force themselves on his attention. But he thus exposes himself to the ill wishes of great numbers, and brings himself under the curse of God, in every thing he does or possesses.

V. 28. (Note, 12.) 'In the places of the impious, the righteous groan; but by their destruction the righteous are multiplied.' (Sept.) 'Some are imprisoned, and sent into obscurity, by the unjust prosecution of the wicked; and others obscure themselves, and groan under those oppressions, till there be a turn of affairs... by the fall of these wretched persons and the preferment of better; which invites virtuous men to appear again, and by the countenance tinually seek to the Lord to uphold them, and to preserve them from, or to render them victorious over, temptation. They may be seduced by plausible deceivers, to go astray in an evil way; and even their diffidence of themselves, and their unsuspecting candour, will sometimes thus expose them: but on reflection and examination, they recover themselves from the snare. They learn to beware of covetousness, and prefer poverty with uprightness to being rich and perverse: being aware, that they that by injury and unjust gain increase their substance, have no other advantage but the toil and anxiety of gathering wealth, for the use of those "that will pity the poor." Yet by the blessing of God they know no want, but are often able to assist their relatives and friends; while such, as affect to despise them, are the disgrace and ruin of those whom they are most bound to comfort, and become themselves, even in this world, abject and miserable: nay, some of this character, both in high and low life, pursuing their ambitious, rapacious, and debauched courses, are led to do violence to the lives of their neighbours, and so hasten their deserved ignominious, and almost unpitied destruction.

V. 18—28. In every rank and state of life, upright conduct is immensely the most safe and advantageous : though the crafty and designing are sanguine in promising themselves, and each other, the most brilliant successes. But the upright not only shun injustice and violence : they also learn faithfulness ; and “ a faithful man shall abound with blessings.” They have mercy on the poor, according to the Lord’s mercy to them : and, giving to them without grudging, they shall not lack, but shall have good things in possession. For instead of following after vain persons, and growing poor by profuseness ; they are frugal and industrious in tilling the land, or in other honest labour ; and thus have plenty of bread, and are therewith content. When young persons enter upon such a pious and prudent medium, they become the credit and comfort of their parents. But, alas ! many prefer being the companions of vicious men, to their shame and grief : their excesses tempt them to rob their parents, and waste their substance ; then they often associate with robbers and destroyers ; they spend their lives in fear and horror, and sometimes end them in ignominy. —Nor should it pass unnoticed, how frequently we are cautioned against covetousness. “ He that hasteth to be rich shall not be innocent.” Some, as magistrates, having respect of persons, often become so mean, as to sell their iniquitous services, and commit the most atrocious crimes, at the lowest price. Others, as ministers, for the sake of filthy lucre betray their trust, shew respect of persons, forsake the law, praise the wicked, flatter with their tongues, cause the righteous to go astray in an evil way, and murder the souls of men. In every situation, the avaricious is sure to have an evil eye, to envy such as are more prosperous, to grudge what goes besides him ; to use unjust or unmerciful ways of increasing his substance ; and instead of giving liberally to the poor, (the best security against want,) to hide his eyes and harden his heart, that their misery and complaints may not prevail with him to lessen his idolized hoard. But what will be the end of these covetous practices, and of these “ children of a curse, who go astray in the way of Balaam, loving the wages of unrighteousness ?” Alas ! they know not what poverty will come upon them here ; and eternal poverty, without one drop of water to cool the tongue, will be their portion, if they die impenitent : while they will have many a curse for their unmercifulness and rapacity. —Others growing “ proud in heart, and ambitious of distinctions even in the church,” stir up strifes, and become fierce disputers about forms and notions. Instead of walking circumspectly in a path bestrewed with snares, and beset with enemies ; they confide in the traitor in their own bosom, and walk on heedlessly, till they fall at once, and there is no remedy. From these snares, may the Lord deliver us ! Let us watch and pray against temptation : let us not be high-minded, but fear : let us examine ourselves, and beg of God to examine us ; and to teach us so seek him, that we may understand all things pertaining to our hope and our walk. Let us learn to value the faithful reprover, and encourage and imitate his faithfulness ; and to shun the fascinating poison of the flatterer, determined neither to listen to his words, nor to learn his ways. And may the Lord give us and ours a believing upright heart, and a peaceful conscience ; that we may have confidence in him, and be bold as a lion through the trials of life, at the approach of death, and in the prospect of the day of judgment ; and let us never forget to pray, that the nation, and all nations, may be governed by such rulers, as encourage every honest attempt to increase the number of the righteous.

CHAP. XXIX. V. 1. "The man of reproofs," (whom men have often warned and counselled, and whom God has repeatedly corrected, but without producing any abiding amendment;) who still continues obstinate and rebellious, as the oxen that will not submit to the yoke, but stiffen their necks against it; will unexpectedly be overtaken by divine judgments, from which there can be no escape or deliverance. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 2. This is 'a tacit admonition unto princes to be good, by describing the happiness which a nation then enjoys.' (Bp. Patrick.) (Notes, xi. 10. xxviii. 12. 28.)

V. 3. (Marg. Ref. Notes, xxiii. 24, 25. xxviii. 7. 19.) "Feedeth harlots."
(Old Translation.)

V. 4. (Marg. Ref.) "A man of oblations." (Marg.) 'The word always signifies, throughout the whole Bible, the heave-offerings which were offered to God :

V. 1.—17. Wicked men are often hypocrites in courage, and conceal an aching trembling heart under the affectation of great composure. But if, at sometimes, they are ready to tremble at the shaking of a leaf, and “to flee when no man pursueth,” how will their hands be strong, or their hearts endure, when the almighty Judge shall pursue them with his dreadful vengeance? This terror will be unspeakably more insupportable, than the dread of them has been to their inferiors and vassals. And yet some of them, who have risen to authority, have been more cruel and terrible than the most savage beasts; and to their own subjects especially, as if ambitious to let all the world know that they wanted understanding, as much as equity! Many of them have been inhuman oppressors and sanguinary persecutors, who have cut off by cruel deaths numbers of their people, and driven the wisest and best of them into exile, or obscurity; constraining them to hide themselves, that they might escape with their lives, and not do violence to their consciences; and employing their scanty ingenuity to render others miserable, and themselves odious and execrated. When nations provoke the Lord by their transgressions, he sends them many such tyrants, as competitors or successors to each other, who, by their fierce contests and implacable resentments, their bloody executions and greedy extortions, are more fatal than earthquakes, pestilences, or the beasts of the field; and who themselves seem to be made only to be taken and destroyed as nuisances to society. But when the Lord hath blessings in store for any people, he raises up a man of understanding, who loves justice and hates covetousness, to rule over them; and thus he both prolongs his own days, and the peaceful estate of the land. Under a ruler of this character, the righteous rejoice and increase, and great honour and prosperity may be expected. For such rulers then we ought to pray; and having obtained our requests, we cannot be too thankful; and every one, according to the duties of his station, should endeavour to check the progress of impiety, and promote national reformation, that we may not forfeit these valuable blessings. But the rich are not the only, nor the most grievous, oppressors: in various ways the poor are more hateful and intolerable. Necessitous and unprincipled men often intrude into the magistracy, or into offices connected with the collection, or expenditure, of the public treasure; and when it comes in their way they squeeze the poor without mercy or shame. It is, however, evident that numbers are not at all aware of their guilt and danger; but are either insensible through ignorance, or presumptuous through a form of godliness. Though they turn away their ears from hearing the law; yet they contend for the doctrines of the gospel: they hope to be saved from hell by grace and faith, though they are not saved from sin, and this present evil world. They also attend on ordinances, and make many and long prayers, though they neglect justice, truth, and mercy: but such prayers are an abomination to the Lord; for they never heartily pray to be delivered from hypocrisy, covetousness, and the love of the world, or to have the law of God written in their hearts. Yet, alas! there are such numbers who agree in forsaking the law, and in excusing and commending each other, and they meet with so many teachers of their own stamp, that they keep themselves and one another in heart and countenance; and they verily conclude, that all else in religion is needlessly strict and scrupulous. So that when such as regard the whole word of God (and conscientiously keep the commandments, and walk uprightly, as well as believe the promises, and trust the mercy of God through Christ for salvation, (attempt to contend with them and argue, that “without holiness no man shall see the Lord; they treat all their warnings with supercilious contempt, as the result of ignorance, bigotry, and a narrow mind. Especially they who are rich, or grow rich in this course, become wise in their own conceits; so that there is more hope of a fool than of them.” And they despise the poor, especially when, being men of understanding, they search them out, and detect their hypocrisy and delusion. For “evil men understand not judgment;” their lusts blind them, and God gives them up to strong delusions to believe a lie: so that they mistake hardness of heart, vain confidence, and carnal security, for gracious assurance and holy boldness. Whilst the established believer, trusting in the Lord, and walking in the path of duty, fears no enemy or danger; but fears always lest he should be deceived by his own heart, to dishonour God, and commit iniquity: these self-deceivers treat all tenderness of conscience and all jealousy of themselves, as want or weakness of faith, or remains of a self-righteous spirit; and thus they harden their hearts against fears of every kind, till they fall into mischief. But true piety begins and proceeds in deep humility. The poor in spirit do not palliate or cover their sins; but they humbly confess and forsake them, hoping thus to find mercy. They are not wise in their own conceits; but seek to the Lord to be their teacher, and are glad to be set right by the poorest man, who can point out any mistake into which they have fallen: and this proves their best security against delusion, and the best method of obtaining well-grounded assurance. They neither refuse to learn and obey the commands of God; nor yet trust in their imperfect services. They do not live in conscious iniquity, and then cloak it with a form of godliness. They aim to walk uprightly, yet they dare not trust in their own deceitful hearts, but con-

V. 12. When flatterers, slanderers, and false teachers are encouraged by the prince, good men either retire, or are driven from employment under him; so that all affairs come into the management of the most unprincipled and mercenary wretches in the nation, to the irreparable disgrace and detriment of both prince and people.

V. 13. (Note, xxii. 22.) The debtor and the usurer; the poor, and those who defraud and oppress them, live together in the world, and the Lord preserves the lives of them both; he gives them the light of the sun, and the blessings of providence; he affords them the light of his word; and he sometimes calls a rich Zaccheus, as well as a poor Lazarus, to be enlightened with the light of life.

V. 14. The king, who in truth and righteousness uses his authority in defending the poor and needy from oppression and wrong, takes the best method of establishing his throne during his own life, and of perpetuating the regal authority in his family to future generations.—This is especially selected as the character of a good king; because in this he most resembles and imitates the King of kings, and Lord of lords. (Marg. Ref. Note, xx. 28.)

V. 15. The mother, &c. The mother is supposed to have the immediate care of the child, during those tender years in which correction is most seasonable and salutary. But mothers are apt to be over-indulgent; and when children are left to themselves to contract bad habits, and to grow obstinate in vice, they become a disgrace to them. (Notes, x. 1. xiii. 24. xxii. 15. xxiii. 13, 14.)

V. 16. When wicked men live together in great numbers, they corrupt and embolden each other in wickedness; they whet each other's ingenuity, and grow more shameless or artful in their crimes. Hence it is that populous cities are almost always more full of daring impiety and iniquity, than country villages.—'When the wicked grow numerous by growing great; wickedness increases by having authority on its side; but let not the righteous hereby be discouraged, for the wicked men are, the shorter is their reign; and they that preserve their virtue shall have the pleasure to behold their downfall.' (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 17. (Note, 15.) The love of ease, and fear of being discomposed or put out of temper, induce many to neglect the correction of their children; but this little interruption of their rest, if submitted to as a self-denying duty, and in dependence on the aid and blessing of God, generally prevents a more durable and distressing disquietude, even that of witnessing or hearing of their evil courses when grown up; and makes way for much peace and comfort, when the correction is the blessed means of their becoming worthy and useful persons. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 18. Where the light of revelation has not reached, the people live in ignorance and ungodliness, and perish in their sins. The Bible and faithful teachers are therefore great mercies; yet men should not deceive themselves, by being hearers only, without being also doers, of the word; for "he that keepeth the law, happy is he." At the same time, this maxim points out those who have no scriptural instruction, as the objects of deep compassion; and inculcates the duty of sending missions, forwarding every design for the instruction of the ignorant, and praying for an increase of faithful labourers, in every part of the vineyard, and of the world.

V. 19. 'A wicked servant.' (Sept.) 'He that is of a servile and rebellious nature.' The servants were generally in those days the property of their masters, who had, under certain restrictions, the power of correcting them; and many would be found, who could not be governed by lenient measures, but would grow more perverse, negligent, sullen, and refractory, under reproofs; so that, in some cases, the most humane master might be constrained to use more rigorous methods, and be justified in using them, as far as he kept within the limits of the law of God.

V. 20. (Note, xxvi. 22.) When a man is so full of self-conceit and presumption, that he will neither take counsel nor warning, but will rashly speak whatever pride, vanity, or passion may suggest; when he is forward to speak before his superiors, or before he has taken time to consider the subject; when he is rash and dogmatical, and disputatious upon the deepest mysteries without due reverence or reflection; there is more hope of the most ignorant and profligate than of him.

V. 21. When a servant, born in a man's house, was treated with indulgent fondness, and not inured to labour or obedience, because he happened to be a which would make one think, that here is signified, a prince that is sacrilegious.—Or, if we do not take it in that strict sense, it denotes one that will suffer himself to be pacified by gifts, and bribed to wink at the most enormous crimes; or, that is so unjust as to find fault perhaps with the most innocent persons, on purpose that they may appease him, by offering a part of their estate to save all the rest.' (Bp. Patrick.)—May not the man of oblations be a prince, who acts as if he were a deity, or had no superior, but possessed power to dispense even with the divine laws, and pardon the crimes which God required him to punish; provided the criminals would make atonement to him by large oblations?

V. 5. Flatterers often aim to inveigle men, by their deceitful commendations, to consent to some proposal which entangles them in difficulties, or to seduce them into sinful compliances. But if they have no such intentions, their encomiums and professions tend to put men off their guard, and to betray them into some foolish and prejudicial conduct, which brings them into great trouble and distress, if they be not finally ruined by it.

V. 6. The designing villain is often ensnared by his own transgression, and ruined by the consequences of his own iniquitous conduct; which causes the righteous to rejoice, in praising and adoring the just judgments of God; as well as in giving thanks for their own preservation, and for having been led in the paths of peace and safety.

V. 7. This has a special reference to the conduct of righteous magistrates, who bestow pains to examine into the causes of the poor, as being most exposed to oppression, and least able to redress themselves; whilst wicked and selfish magistrates disregard those by whom nothing is to be gained. 'They are bound in conscience to search into the truth of things; not to be sparing of their pains, to find out the bottom of a business; which he that refuses to do, nay, perhaps rejects the complaint of the poor, or beats them off with big words; or out of the hardness of his heart, or the love of ease, or fear of great men, or any other respect, will not give them audience, or not consider and redress their grievance; Solomon pronounces him a wicked person.' (Bp. Patrick.) But the maxim is equally applicable to the compassionate attention of pious men to the distresses of the poor; and the unfeeling disregard to them, which is often shewn by the wicked, nay, sometimes by such as would be thought religious.

V. 8. 'Men of scorn,' (Hebrew) 'signify such as mock at religion, and at all things that are serious.' (Bp. Patrick.) Persons of this description, more than any other kind of wicked or foolish men, seem framed for the ruin of nations, especially when they possess influence or authority; for they lead the people further and further into wickedness and impiety, and ripen communities for divine judgments; and then by their selfish, rash, or infatuated schemes, they help to bring those judgments upon them; except as the wise and pious avert the wrath of God, by their prayers and zealous endeavours to promote religion, and to counteract the tendency of such pernicious measures.

V. 9. If a wise man inadvertently engage in any sort of contest or dispute with a conceited and empty wrangler, he will be sure to be treated either with furious anger, or with ridicule, in return for his most conclusive arguments. And whether the fool rage or deride, it will be equally uneasy to his opponent; who will find it very difficult to extricate himself with credit and comfort.

V. 10. Men of blood hate those upright rulers who are a terror to them, and they hate the image of God in his servants, (as Cain hated, envied, and slew his brother, and as the Jews hated and crucified Christ.) But the righteous seek and pray for the salvation even of those who thirst for their blood; or the righteous seek to defend the lives of their persecuted brethren, and of their upright rulers, against the machinations of the bloodthirsty.

V. 11. The word translated mind, has different meanings, according to which different interpretations are given of the proverb: 'A fool shews all his anger immediately, but a wise man keeps it in till he has a fitting opportunity to express it most to the purpose.' 'A fool blurts out every thing that comes into his head, but a wise man speaks only as much as is necessary.' 'A fool utters all he knows, but a wise man conceals many things.' (Bp. Patrick.)—The heat and vehemence of spirit, with which inconsiderate and rash men dispute and conduct affairs, as contrasted with the calmness, discretion, and caution of those who are eminently wise, seem especially meant. (Marg. Ref.)

24 Whoso is a partner with a thief hateth his own soul: he heareth cursing, and bewrayeth it not.

comely or witty child; it would tend to make him unfit for service, and negligent in his business: thus he would become useless and uncomfortable, insolent and ungovernable, and expect to be treated like a child of the family.—Good usage, as a servant, does not imply that indulgence which would ruin a child.

V. 22. (Notes, xv. 18. xvii. 19.)

V. 23. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 24. The man who is a partner in any fraud or theft, or receiveth stolen goods, is not only as bad as the thief; but, being likely to be called upon as a witness, and to be put upon his oath to declare all he knows, he will probably perjure himself rather than discover his accomplices; and so bring wrath upon his soul on another account. When the Israelites were put upon their oath, the judge adjured them, in the name and presence of God, to declare the truth, as they would escape his awful curse. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 25, 26. (Marg. Ref.) The fear of man, in a variety of ways, proves an ensnaring temptation. Numbers, fearing reproach, are ashamed of Christ and his cause. In persecution, many, through fear of man, apostatize; and others neglect their bounden duties, and forsake the ordinances of God. Some, having committed one crime, from the fear of man, add others to conceal it. Even Christians, from fear of their brethren who differ from them, are tempted to dissemble, and draw others into dissimulation; and ministers, from the fear of censure, or unpopularity, too often consult the inclinations of the people, and of some leading men, or powerful friend, more than the sacred oracles. They shun to declare the whole counsel of God, take to themselves the merit of being prudent, and censure their more faithful brethren. Nay, masters of families are often so afraid even of their servants and children, that, having long neglected family-worship, they dare not set about it, even when convinced that it is their duty. But no enumeration can reach the tenth of the cases, in which the fear of man, proving stronger than the fear of God, draws in persons of almost every character, to commit sin, or neglect duty: yet confidence in God preserves the established believer from this temptation, or enables him to overcome it, and secures him in every situation.—The marginal references point out a few instances, from that of Abraham denying his wife, to that of Peter dissembling at Antioch.—But this temptation would in many cases lose much of its force, were it well considered, that while many seek the ruler's favour, "every man's judgment is of the LORD." What God hath appointed, that shall come to him.

V. 27. There is not only a contrariety of character, but a mutual antipathy betwixt the righteous and the wicked, proportioned to the degree of their holiness or wickedness. They are an abomination to each other. But whilst the wicked hate the persons, as well as the characters and company, of the righteous, the righteous abhor the conduct, yet pity and pray for the persons, of the wicked.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1-14. It is an unspeakable advantage to any people, when the righteous are invested with authority, and for it we all are bound to pray, or to bless the Lord; but the advancement of the wicked, however eminent for genius, capacity, and splendid achievements, shall be deprecated or deplored, as a public calamity, as one of the heaviest judgments inflicted on nations by an offended God. The magistrate, whether the king as supreme, or one in authority under him, if he rule in judgment, establishes the land; but rulers who are influenced by bribes, or by lies, ruin the state, and corrupt the mass of the people, by their pestilential influence, example, and the fatal effects of their own misconduct.—We cannot but be aware that scornful men, whose hearts are hardened in profane mockery of God and religion, will despise remarks of this kind; yet, let them look well to it, for while they bring cities and nations into a snare, "the devil takes them captive at his will."—They will, no doubt, not only despise the words of God's ministers, but secretly hate and perhaps ridicule those princes who faithfully judge and protect the poor. But the King of Zion, whose "throne is established for ever," will protect and bless those who copy his example, and frown into destruction all those who are enemies to them and to him. Indeed, the upright Christian, in every situation, must expect to be hated by the bloodthirsty, the fraudulent, and such as perjure themselves for gain; but they have the affectionate prayers of the righteous in their behalf, who seek the preservation of their lives and the salvation of their souls. But whilst various means are used to repress iniquity, and wicked men are warned and corrected, that they may be reclaimed; there are still vast numbers, who having been often reprov'd, so harden themselves in obstinate wickedness, and in contemptuous or stubborn defiance of all authority, that they must be cut off by condign punishment, for an example to others. The word of God likewise warns us all to flee from the wrath to come, to the hope set before us in Jesus Christ. Yet many, who are thus repeatedly reprov'd and invited, sin against the light, and against their own consciences, and grow more daring and impudent in wickedness; till they suddenly perish and that without remedy. For in the transgression of the wicked there is a snare, as birds are caught in a net, and when the snare is drawn, they can by no means disentangle themselves. The flatterer also, as Satan's coadjutor, spreads his net for our feet. The pride of our hearts first disposes us to flatter ourselves, and to admire our own fancied excellences, and to excuse our crimes as foibles; but being sometimes hard put to it, to keep up this good opinion of ourselves, when we are conscious of so much evil, we are apt to look out for other witnesses to confirm us in it; and we are prepared to pay them in kind, or in some other way, for this favourable testimony. This disposition of the heart prepares us for flattery; and some will persuade men to conclude their state good, though they have no scriptural evidence of it. Some magnify the merits of a man's generous virtues and noble mind, and represent heaven as his just reward; and extenuate the evil of the grossest crimes, as mere trifles, for which none but uncharitable fanatics can suppose that God will condemn them to everlasting punishment. Thus men are caught in the net, and live upon tolerable terms with their consciences, and grow secure in presumptuous wickedness; till too late they find that there is a hell, and that there is no getting out of it. These, and such like flatterers, often spread their nets from pulpits: they speak smooth things, and prophesy deceit; and the people love to have it so, especially the rich and great: the sermon is very comfortable, the hearers are well pleased with themselves and with the preacher; they flatter him in return, and spread a net for his feet, and reward him with more substantial emoluments, till, Satan takes the whole company in his snare. Even when flattery does not proceed so far, it feeds a man's vanity, makes him venture on employments for which he is unqualified; leads him into temptations, exposes him to reproofs and corrections, and precludes his progress and improvement.—"He that loveth wisdom, while he rejoiceth his father," if living, not only shuns the company and intimacy of profligate men and women, but he takes care not to engage in any contest with foolish and unprincipled persons; knowing that whatever means are used, or however their profane scorn or indignant rage may predominate, there can be no comfort in such litigations, and no credit in victory, though much disgrace if baffled in them. Whilst the fool uttereth all his mind, however it may injure or exasperate others, or expose himself, the wise man will keep it in till afterwards, and will be careful not to be rash and hasty in his words, especially not to decide presumptuously of the deep things of God, which is an arrogance of the most provoking nature. The true believer also will seek the salvation of those who hate him, or even thirst for his blood: and he will not only be kind to the poor, but bear with the deceitful, as his heavenly Father causes his sun to shine, and his rain to descend upon them. Far from being induced by avarice to associate with thieves and cheats, he will be indifferent about worldly interests, and take pleasure in considering the cause of the poor, and in relieving their distress, which the wicked disregard and increase. Thus in one view we may perceive, that when rulers are wicked, and hearken to flattery and lies, all their servants are wicked also: then the ungodly are multiplied, and transgression increaseth, and the righteous are had in abomination, whilst they grieve over and abhor the iniquity they witness, but cannot help. But whilst scorners thus bring the city into a snare, the despised remnant of the righteous often turn away the wrath of God, and prevent national judgments. For, however men may deceive themselves, the wise and righteous alone have present satisfaction, and they alone shall have everlasting honour and felicity.

V. 15-27. Fallen man is so prone to evil, that, from the earliest youth, there will be very many things in his conduct to be blamed; and as the faculties unfold, his sinful propensities gather strength, and produce their effects more and more. Our aim, therefore, should be, by every proper means, to counteract this tendency of corrupt nature; and thus it may be said with propriety, that "the rod and reproof give wisdom." For rebukes and corrections, properly administered, check the luxuriant growth of evil dispositions, and inure the will and passions to subjection. But when a child is left to himself, and humoured in his wayward inclinations, he grows more self-willed and untractable daily, and his passions demand still further gratifications, till, keeping company with harlots, or running into other excesses, he both wastes the substance of his parents, and brings a reproach upon them for improperly educating him. If we, then, would have our children yield satisfaction to our hearts, we must give them proper correction and instruction. Indulgence, as well as severity, is indeed an extreme which must be avoided. Whilst servants and inferiors should be treated with great humanity and equity, it is a real injury to them to bring them up delicately, to disuse them from labour, and to habituate them to a mode of living unsuitable to their station; for this tends to render them wretched, when constrained to return to their former occupations, or to tempt them sinfully to desert them. So that an over fondness should not be indulged towards any individual; at least, unless the person means to provide for him according to that way of living to which he is thus accustomed. Nay, this counteracts its own end, and, instead of rendering those who are thus peculiarly favoured more attentive and obliging, it naturally serves to make them imperious, assuming, and untractable; and thus uneasy to those who have spoiled them, and unfit for every other person. Indeed, such perverseness is in man, that it is found impossible to persist in that gentleness which is in itself desirable. There are too many who grow heedless and indolent, when only spoken to with mildness, and sullen and refractory, when reprov'd with sharpness; so that, though they understand, they will not answer, but will do every thing contrary to what is desired. This same perverseness, carried to a greater excess, renders prisons, and other punishments, necessary, because numbers cannot otherwise be dealt with. Both masters and servants, however, may be thankful, that the one is delivered from the trouble and the temptation, and the other from the oppression, which results from the power of punishment being entrusted to private persons ; and, in our circumstances, we may so behave to our servants, that, discharging them from our families may be a sufficient punishment for ordinary misdemeanors ; and, in grosser offences, the civil magistrate may be applied to.—While we should be thankful that we inhabit “ the valley of vision,” and have abundant means of instruction ; and while we pity, and pray for, and try to help, as we are able, such as are not so highly favoured ; let us not forget, that, if we neglect the great salvation of the gospel, or pretend to value it, when we refuse to obey any of God's commandments, we shall perish with deeper aggravation than even the inhabitants of Sodom and Gomorrah.—We have, therefore, greater reason to watch against the treachery of our hearts ; and especially against every kind of pride and self-sufficiency. For this, above all things, tends to bring a man low ; but honour, and He who is the true fountain of honour, upholds the humble in spirit.—Again, as the fear of man bringeth a snare, we should be instant in prayer, that we be not thus entangled. This we shall easily be, if we forget that every man's judgment, and the determination of his lot, cometh of the Lord ; and, therefore, many seek the ruler's favour, and fear his frown, instead of humbly trusting in God, who has all hearts in his hand ; nay, we are prone to dread the reproach or contempt of the poor and mean ; so that many dare not profess what they believe to be true, nor seek truth where they sometimes think it might be found ; nor perform their known duty, and relinquish the vanities of the world ; nor act up to their own judgment and consciences ; for fear of being talked about, pointed at, derided, reviled, hated, or persecuted, or of losing the favour of this or the other friend : thus they are ashamed to own Christ now ; and if they persist in this course, he will be ashamed of them at the day of judgment. But he who trusteth in the Lord will be saved. Depending on his mercy, grace, and providence, he will boldly keep his commandments, and, in so doing, find true happiness, and a sure refuge. We must also remember, that “ the friendship of the world is enmity with God ;” and that the wicked abhor the righteous : we should lay our account with the enmity of the ungodly, and never court their friendship ; yet, we should seek to do them all the good we can ; and while angry men stir up strife, and abound in transgression, we should persist in “ following after peace and holiness, without which no man shall see the Lord.”

NOTES.

CHAP. XXX. V. 1. These last two chapters form an appendix to the book of Proverbs, it is probable, annexed to it by the men of Hezekiah. It may be supposed that the names of Agur, and Jakeh his father, were well known in Israel at that time. The expression, “ the prophecy,” or the burden, seems to imply, that these instructions were communicated to the church as a divine revelation, and their claim has been very long allowed of. Agur “ spake unto Ithiel, and unto Ucal.” The word Ithiel signifies “ God with me ;” and Ucal “ a mighty one !” (literally, I shall be able ; ) and some have thought that they referred more to the subject of Agur's prophecy, than to the persons whom he addressed. But it is the more common opinion, that they were Agur's disciples, or pupils, who had proposed some questions to him, which he answered as follows.—The notion that Solomon was meant under the name Agur, though held by some of the fathers, is now generally given up.

V. 2, 3. Agur, though consulted by others, was far from deeming himself competent to instruct them ; nay, his acquaintance with his own heart, his conflict with his evil propensities, and his frequent deep thoughts upon the mysteries of religion, which he could not properly explore or apprehend, made him ready to think that, “ surely he was more brutish than any man, and had not the understanding of a man.” He had learned a little of his own ignorance, but he could not pretend to any proficiency in wisdom, in the knowledge of the Holy One, and of those holy things which relate to him.—The last clause may be rendered interrogatively, “ Shall I know the knowledge of holy things ?” Perhaps he meant, that neither his natural endowments, nor any advantages of his education, tended to qualify him for a teacher. If, then, he was enabled to communicate any useful instruction, the whole honour of it belonged to God alone. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 4. This may refer to the preceding verses. Man's study and investigation cannot find out God ; nor can he comprehend him in his narrow mind. No one hath ascended into heaven, to obtain information on these mysterious subjects ; nor hath any one descended from heaven, to bring intelligence concerning them. None could emulate, or even comprehend, the works of him,

“ who hath gathered the wind in his fists,” &c. If there were, or ever had been, such a person, who was he ? and who could claim his descent from him ? Thus the inquiry is generally interpreted. Yet it seems to me a prophetic intimation of him who came down from heaven to be our instructor and Saviour, and then ascended into heaven to be our advocate ; who, as one with the Father, created and upholds all things ; who was known, in some measure, to the ancient church, as JEHOVAH, I AM, and as the only begotten Son of God, (Psalm ii. 7 ; ) and from whom alone the knowledge of God can be obtained. The name of the great Creator, as manifested through his Son, seems to be inquired after ; and who is that wise and happy man that has obtained this knowledge ? (Marg. Ref.)

V. 5, 6. (Note, Psalm xii. 6.) The understanding of divine truth is not to be obtained by curious speculations, but by regarding the word of God, which is “ sure, and maketh wise the simple ;” and nothing must be added to it under pretence of infallibility, authority of fathers and councils, traditions of the elders, reasonings of philosophers, or dreams of enthusiasts. In this manner, heresies, and false religions of various kinds, are introduced and supported. But they who palm their own inventions upon mankind as of equal authority with the word of God, will be found liars of the worst kind, both deceivers and deceived ; and may expect to be severely punished for their temerity or presumption. This caution is worthy of their notice who are continually wanting to alter and amend (as they call it) the text of the Scriptures by conjectural criticism ; which generally adds a new clause to God's word, instead of the old one that is expunged, either as unintelligible, or as inconsistent with the critic's favourite system. Paraphrasts should also be cautious, what words they insert to make out the meaning of difficult passages, and to render them consistent with their favourite schemes. And great humility and modesty are requisite, in order to explain and apply the Scriptures, especially the more mysterious and controverted passages, lest we should seem to add any thing to the words of God, as of equal authority with them ; and so be found guilty of forging Scripture, and counterfeiting the name of God, saying, “ Thus saith the Lord ;” although he hath not spoken.” (Marg. Ref.)

V. 7-9. Agur's mind was fixed upon the Lord, though he did not immediately mention him. He especially desired two things to be granted him before, or until, his death, as the context seems to imply. The one relates directly to spiritual blessings ; “ Remove far from me vanity, and lies ;” that is, “ Deliver me entirely from guilt and sin ; from idolatry, error, delusion, and temptation, and from having the vanities of the world for my portion.” The other relates to temporal things, yet in subserviency to heavenly. Agur prayed against both poverty and riches, not so much because of the hardships of the one, and the anxious encumbrances of the other, as because of the temptations to which they would severally expose him. If he lived in great affluence, he feared lest he should grow self-indulgent, and forgetful of God ; and so, at length, be induced to deny his over-ruling providence, his authority, or even his existence, saying, like Pharaoh, “ Who is the LORD ?” If he were reduced to extreme poverty, he feared lest he should be tempted to dishonesty, and then to perjury, in order to prevent detection and punishment ; or, as some interpret it, to murmur against God, and through impatience to speak impious words of him. He, therefore, wisely prayed for a mediocrity, that he might be kept at a distance from these temptations ; he asked food convenient for him, “ daily bread,” suited to his station, his family, and his real good.—There is a remarkable coincidence betwixt this prayer and several clauses of the Lord's prayer.

V. 10. “ Hurt not a servant to his master with thy tongue.” Do not abuse any poor slave, whose condition is wretched enough. Rather excuse than aggravate his fault to his master, who, perhaps, is too rigorous ; and be sure never to load him with unjust accusations, lest, being wronged by thee, and not knowing how to right himself, he appeal to the Lord, and pray him to punish thee, and thou, being found guilty, feel the heavy effects of his vengeance.” (Bp. Patrick).—By accusing a servant to his master, (even without direct slander,) in an officious manner, and a trivial concern, great injustice may be done to his character and future comfort, and a strong temptation thrown in his way to commit sin, by yielding to anger, and uttering grievous imprecations. This is, no doubt, peculiarly the case in respect of slaves, but not exclusively ; and if a man have not a substantial reason for speaking disadvantageously of another, especially of an inferior to his superior, he has always a good reason for being silent. The lenient side is generally best; and intermeddling in other men's family concerns, especially to make mischief, is always odious and contemptible. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 11-14. Some commentators suppose all the several parts of this chapter to be the answers of Agur to the questions of Ithiel and Ucal; and that these verses especially point out four odious, but too common characters, whom he cautioned them to stand aloof from. These are called generations, because they are found through successive ages, as if descended from those predecessors whom they resemble; or because they associate together as if they belonged to the same family. They are branded as hateful and dangerous persons, whose crimes must be shunned, and of whom all should beware.—In every age there are monsters of ingratitude, who, instead of requiting and praying for their parents, curse them, wish them dead, or otherwise abuse them, either from resentment of rebukes, contempt of authority, impatience of restraint, or avidity of their substance.—There are also from age to age a multitude of people, who, by one pretence or other, persuade themselves that they are holy persons, the favourites of God, and the heirs of heaven; whose hearts are yet full of the prevailing pollution of iniquity, and who practise much secret wickedness, and so are filthy in the sight of their heart-searching Judge.—Another company is found in every age, who are full of self-importance; whose haughtiness and arrogance are conspicuous in their looks, who are purse-proud, or vain of their birth, rank, accomplishments, or decorations; and who, in a stately manner, shew their supercilious contempt of all around them.—There have also been in every age a number of rapacious and cruel extortioners, who devour the poor and needy to increase their wealth, or to support the expense of their riotous living. These being worse than any savage beasts that are known of, must be described as monsters that may be imagined, but never yet were seen, "whose teeth are swords, and their jaw-teeth knives."—The expression (12) "washed from their filthiness," is peculiarly emphatical; and strongly implies, that there is a loathsome filthiness in human nature; and that none are pure in the sight of God, but those who are washed from it, "by the washing of regeneration, and renewing of the Holy Ghost;" for, depravity of nature and heart, rather than crimes actually committed, seems intended, though both may be implied. (Note, 1 Cor. vi. 9-11.)

V. 15, 16. The horseleech, or blood-sucker, gorges blood, and having emptied itself, craves more; and sometimes even sucks till it bursts.—The leech hath two forks in her tongue, which here he calleth her daughters, whereby she sucketh blood, and is never satiate; even so are the covetous extortioners insatiable.—The two daughters of the horseleech, however, may mean, the insatiable love of money, and the insatiable love of those pleasures that money purchases; or covetousness, whether to hoard or spend; and blood-thirstiness, which powerful and cruel oppressors, and rapacious warriors, exercise, who are not satisfied, but thirst for more, after all they have shed. Or, they may denote in general the insatiable nature of man's sinful propensities, which always grow more craving by indulgence. (Marg. Ref.) The same kind of expression is used in several places, and the emblems, though striking, need no comment.

V. 17. The man who derideth his parents because of the infirmities of old age, and despiseth their authority, will expose himself to the severest judgments of God. Many of this vile character have come to an untimely end, and have been gibbeted, or left unburied, till the ravens or eagles have picked out their eyes, or devoured their flesh; and all of the same description may expect a similar doom.

22 For a servant when he reigneth; and a fool when he is filled with meat;

23 For a odious woman when she is married; and a handmaid that is heir to her mistress.

24 ¶ There be four things which are little upon the earth, but they are exceeding wise:

25 The ants are a people not strong, yet they prepare their meat in the summer;

26 The conies are but a feeble folk, yet make they their houses in the rocks;

27 The locusts have no king, yet go they forth all of them by bands;

28 The spider taketh hold with her hands, and is in kings' palaces.

29 ¶ There be three things which go well, yea, four are comely in going:

30 A lion, which is strongest among beasts, and turneth not away for any;

31 A greyhound; an he-goat also; and a king against whom there is no rising up.

32 If thou hast done foolishly in lifting up thyself, or if thou hast thought evil, lay thine hand upon thy mouth.

33 Surely the churning of milk bringeth forth butter, and the wringing of the nose bringeth forth blood: so the forcing of wrath bringeth forth strife.

V. 18-20. The path of the eagle through the air, that of the serpent on the rock, and that of the ship through the sea, cannot be traced, nor doth any one exactly follow another in the same course. So, artful men insinuate themselves into the affections of young women, and seduce them to their ruin, by an almost an infinity of stratagems, which can never be all unravelled. Thus, also, the adulterous wife uses much ingenuity to impose on her husband, to shun detection, and to escape shame and punishment, by schemes and devices which cannot all be enumerated. Every new crime intended, or committed, gives rise to some new artifice; as the ship, in some degree, deviates every time from the course which it steered before. The object of the seducer is to prevail over his prey, and that of the adulteress to conceal her guilt; and the whole extent of their subtlety and ingenuity is employed to effect those purposes.

V. 21-23. The following events create much disturbance in the world, and should therefore be avoided, or prevented, as much as possible. When men of low extraction and base spirit obtain authority, they are apt to be imperious, tyrannical, rapacious, and cruel; they grow intoxicated by their sudden elevation, jealous of every one as if harbouring designs against them, impatient of control, fierce in their resentments, and exorbitant in their exactions; and thus nations are disquieted, embroiled in wars, burdened with excessive taxes, or shocked with bloody executions. When foolish and violent men eat and drink to excess, their impertinence, scurrility, impiety, contentiousness, or obscenity, render them a vexation and an insupportable burden to every company into which they find admission. When a woman of a contentious disposition, and prone to odious vices, is married, her folly and wickedness will be the disquietude of her husband and his family; and he will, probably, repent of his improper choice, even if he had a large dowry with her. And when a female servant succeeds to the substance of her mistress, or rather supplants her in the affections of her husband, and influences him to divorce his wife, and then to marry her. When this has been the case, or even if she succeeds a deceased mistress, as married to her husband, she will frequently disquiet the family by her insolence or rapacity, by appropriating all that she can to herself, and those belonging to her, to the injury of those to whom it more properly belongs.

V. 24-28. The instinctive wisdom of these four animals is mentioned as a lesson to the reader, who should learn to estimate men, not by their external greatness, or magnificence, but by their wisdom. The ants are wise in diligently providing against the winter; the conies (or mountain-mice as some think) in forming refuges to themselves against the weather, and from their pursuers; the locusts in their regular and unanimous movements, as if they did every thing by consent, and for the common good; and the spider in her ingenuity and assiduity in forming her webs against the walls, as if she took hold of them with hands; in renewing her work, when repeatedly destroyed, and in seeking and waiting for her prey with patient attention, wherever it is to be found, for which purpose she even enters into kings' palaces, whose greatness and delicacy cannot exclude so mean and unwelcome a guest. From all these four, some have noted that an abridgment may be made of all that is necessary for the conservation of a kingdom in good estate: where, first, care must be taken for provision of food; then for secure and commodious dwelling; then that there be concord and agreement; and, lastly, that industry and ingenious arts be encouraged. (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 29-31. There are also three, or rather four things, whose motion is majestic, and go after a goodly manner. (Bp. Patrick.) The four are remarkable for the comeliness, or propriety of their going. The lion, conscious of his strength and courage, marches on, and does not alter his pace, or quit his path for those that meet or pursue him. The greyhound (some think the war-horse was meant) is ready for his course, and performs it with great celerity and activity. The he-goat goes before the flock, as one careful about them, attentive to their safety; and the king who adverts to the dignity of his own character, and represses with vigour such as venture to rise up against him.

V. 32, 33. The mention of the king, against whom there is no rising up, seems to have suggested this concluding caution. If any one had foolishly taken too much on himself in the presence of the king, or had entertained thoughts of insurrection, or had harboured resentment or given offence, his wisest course would be to keep silence from all rash or provoking words, and even from excuses, or from charging the blame on others, and to appear sorry and humbled for what had passed. For, as in common affairs, causes produce their known effects, and the churning of the milk or cream is observed to produce butter, and the violent wringing of the nose to bring forth blood: so, it hath always been observed, that the forcing of wrath by contemptuous or virulent words or actions, occasions the most mischievous and implacable contentions.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1-9. In proportion as we become acquainted with God and ourselves, with his will and our own hearts and actions, we shall be sensible of our sinfulness, ignorance, and weakness. And the experienced and considerate believer, knowing more of himself than he does of others, can sometimes scarcely suppose it possible that there should be such evils in their hearts as he finds in his own; or that they should be so insensible, forgetful, or unteachable as he is. On these occasions he will readily say, "Surely I am more brutish than any man, and have not the understanding of a man." The wisdom or knowledge of fallen man is not his own; he hath not learned it of himself, but hath received it of God: and by increasing knowledge, men attain deeper convictions of the immense disproportion which there is betwixt the little which they do understand, and that boundless extent of being with which they have no acquaintance. They perceive also the indistinctness and inaccuracy of their knowledge; they are continually detecting themselves in mistakes, and even the errors of others, who were on many accounts their superiors, tend to convince them, that "here they see through a glass darkly," and "have not learned wisdom, and have not attained to the knowledge of the holy." The sublimity and immensity of such subjects, compared with man's capacities, his present confined opportunities, his short space for making observations and gaining experience, convince the humble Christian, "that such knowledge is too high for him, he cannot attain unto it." So that ignorance and want of thought are the true causes of men's dogmatical self-confidence and conceit of their own knowledge. For who hath explored, or comprehended the works of Him "that hath established all the ends of the earth?" Who can fathom the deep mysteries of the Divine nature, or find out the Almighty to perfection? Who can "know the Son, but the Father, or the Father but the Son, and he to whom the Son will reveal him?" He indeed came down from heaven, to declare to men the name and character of JEHOVAH: and now, ascended into heaven, he hath opened the way of acceptance and access to all believers. Happy then is he, who "counts all but loss for the excellency of the knowledge of Christ," and of the Father through the Son. This knowledge is communicated by his word, which is pure and infallible, in which there is no dross, no error, no deficiency, no redundancy. May we believe his testimony, embrace his invitations, plead his promises, observe his directions, and keep his commandments; and then we shall be wise unto salvation, and at length "know even as we are known:" and in the mean time, we shall trust in him, and he will be a shield unto us from all our enemies round about. But let us not want to be wise above what is written, or to add man's vain reasonings and presumptuous inventions to the truths of God, lest he reprove us, and we be found liars and deceivers. For the desire of knowledge is as capable of exorbitance, as any other inclination of our fallen nature, and is productive of the most dreadful effects; whilst men, proud of their own wisdom, prefer their own conjectures to the infallible testimony of God, and "speak perverse things to draw away disciples after them," who "will utterly perish in their own delusions." Against such perils, faith in the promises of God, and fervent prayer, form our only security.—In coming to his mercy-seat, we should always consider the near approach of death, and its eternal consequences. Then the time of prayer will be over; and we should therefore be the more earnest to obtain our requests before we die, and to be preserved from sin and temptation till we die. We should be particular, as well as urgent, in our supplications, yet all the variety of them may be reduced to two things, "things needful for the soul, and things needful for this present life." But the former should have the decided preference, and the latter should be sought in entire subserviency. If we be far removed from vanity and lies, if we be interested in the pardoning love of God, and have him as our portion; if we be preserved from delusions and overwhelming temptations; if we walk with God, and live in communion with him, and can commit our souls into his hands at death, and have an entrance into "the everlasting kingdom of our Lord and Saviour, Jesus Christ;" then we shall have all that we can ask or think, in all our varied prayers and supplications, as far as they relate to ourselves. It does not indeed behove us to be so explicit in respect of temporal things, but if we suppose one situation to be more exempt from temptation than another, we may properly pray for it. Should the Lord please to prove us with deep poverty, we ought not to murmur, and we may expect grace sufficient to resist the powerful temptations of such a condition. But if we know the deceitfulness of our own hearts, and consider what it would be to suffer hunger, cold, and the want of all things, we shall perceive that temptations to dishonesty would have a mighty force in them; and we cannot tell but we might be led from smaller to greater transgressions, till we arrived at such degrees of guilt as we now shudder to think of. We may, in this view, therefore, in humble submission, pray to be preserved from poverty, and to be fed with food convenient for us. On the other hand, when we consider how affluence tends to pride, indolence, self-indulgence, and a worldly mind; how they who are fed to the full, and surrounded by abundance, are prone to abuse the gift, and forget the giver, and refuse obedience to him; we cannot pray to be made rich, without contradicting the petition which our Lord himself hath taught us, "lead us not into temptation." We are, indeed, commonly apt to think that we should be able to behave properly, and to do much good, if we were made richer; but this only proves the pride and folly of our hearts. For it is the hardest thing in the world to act wisely in great prosperity: and the greatest triumph of grace seems to be the conversion of very rich people; and the preserving of them humble, spiritual, dead to the world, devoted to God, and good stewards of the unrighteous mammon, in the midst of all their incentives to the contrary vices. So that it will ever be found a wise prayer, though but seldom offered, "Give me not riches, lest I be full, and deny thee, and say, Who is the Lord?" The more advanced Christian will sincerely and frequently present it: every true believer can fervently pray, "Lord, let me never have more riches, than thou shalt enable me to use to thy glory." And we all ought to be, and doubtless many of us are thankful, if we enjoy that mediocrity, which we are here taught by the Holy Spirit to consider as the safest and happiest condition in life. But how contrary is this to the almost universal eagerness of men after riches! In fact, the wisdom of God and the wisdom of the world are diametrically opposite; and, alas! there is but a scanty measure of divine wisdom even amongst the majority of Christians.

V. 10-33. It is no small attainment in heavenly wisdom, habitually and diligently to attend on the duties of our own station, and never to intermeddle with other men's concerns, unless to do them good. It is base to create any one needless uneasiness: but it is peculiarly cruel wantonly to increase the sufferings of the needy, the helpless, or the oppressed; and thus, also, to tempt them to sin, and to imprecate divine vengeance on their calumniators. We need not, however, wonder that we see around us numbers living in the grossest iniquities; as there always have been a generation of such, the seed of the serpent, and the children of the wicked one. But we should mourn over them, pray for them, and protest against them. Doubtless, they who curse, and deride, and despise their parents, will bring upon themselves both temporal and eternal destruction, except they repent of this their most aggravated wickedness: nor will pharisaical or antinomian self-deceivers, who are pure in their own eyes, but are not cleansed from their filthiness; or the proud and haughty, who exalt themselves, and look down with contempt on their neighbours; or cruel extortioners and oppressors, escape the vengeance of God. Let the generation of God's children manifest a contrary spirit in every respect. Let such as have parents and superior relations, behave with submission and respect to them, continually blessing and praying for them: yea, let us all be subject one to another, in the several relations of life, and be clothed with humility. In the consciousness of our remaining defilement, let us seek daily to be more and more cleansed from our filthiness, and yet to be more abased in our own eyes, and more gentle, affable, and lowly in our deportment among men; and, instead of devouring the poor and needy, let us study to protect, relieve, and comfort them, to the extent of our ability. In order to this, we must beware of covetousness and profuseness, which, like the two daughters of the horse-leech, evermore cry, Give, give, but never have any thing to spare: and we must learn to habituate every one of our inclinations to brook denial, otherwise no emblem in nature will adequately illustrate their insatiable cravings.—Whilst we behold, with grief and wonder, the subtlety and wicked ingenuity with which the ungodly seduce, debauch, deceive, and ruin one another and themselves, let us guard against their snares; and consider the capacities of our minds as given us that we may employ all our contrivances and sagacity in devising how to do good. But let the ingenious and successful workers of iniquity, who manage to escape the detection of man, remember that they cannot elude the all-seeing eye, or escape the dreadful judgment, of God.—The miseries of the world arise in great measure from the ill-behaviour of men in those stations to which they are called. This, however, is often owing to the wickedness and folly of those concerned, who advance mean and worthless upstarts to authority, and put it in their power to be the plague of whole nations. The erroneous choice, also, and treatment of companions, and the wrong motives which influence men in marrying, or in disposing of their property, fill society and domestic life with great disquietude. But let every one mortify in himself those odious dispositions, and avoid that evil conduct, which, in many cases, almost renders life insupportable; for who would choose to be a curse to society, and to all connected with him?—Let us also look around, and avail ourselves of every hint suggested to us even by the animal tribes. We may learn foresight, industry, and perseverance, from the ant; from the conies, to provide security against approaching dangers; from the locusts, to be contented in our proper station, and to do all things in harmony and peace; and from the spider, to employ our ingenuity and patient assiduity wherever we are, not in useless trifles, but in those things which pertain to our sustenance and well-being. And the sermons of these despicable insects will condemn numbers for their improvidence and sloth, their sin and folly. The Christian may also learn from the lion to be bold in the path of duty, and not to turn aside for any man; from the greyhound, or horse, to be ever ready and active, and cheerful in running the race set before him; from the he-goat, to be the guide, overseer, and example of his family, and to take proper care of them; and from the king, not to act inconsistently with the dignity of his character, nor to suffer any of his passions to rebel and prevail against him. But, alas! how often have we risen up against God our King! We have done foolishly in thus lifting up ourselves, and in thinking evil against him. Let us, then, lay our hands upon our mouths, and abase ourselves before him, and not farther provoke his wrath by our impudent and persevering wickedness. Having found peace with him, let us follow peace with all men; and let us always remember the connection between the means and the end. For, as in the ordinary concerns of life, some means generally produce desirable effects, whilst other terminate in pain and trouble; so, no spiritual blessings can be obtained by those who neglect the appointed means, nor are they ever sincerely used in vain: and if men will waste their time in those books, diversions, and vanities, which are the means of soothing the conscience, and hardening the heart, surely the end will be answered, and the wrath of God will be the dreadful consequence.

NOTES.

CHAP. XXXI. V. 1. Some think that Solomon was meant under the name of Lemuel, and that Bathsheba called him by this name. But others, with greater probability, suppose Lemuel to have been some neighbouring prince, whose mother, perhaps, was a pious Israelite. Indeed, the use of Chaldean words in this chapter, and in no other part of the book, affords a cogent argument that it was written by another hand, and, probably, at a later period than the proverbs of Solomon; but whether it was added to this book by the men of Hezekiah, or after the captivity, is not certain. However, Lemuel retained the early instructions of his mother, and published them for the benefit of others; and as they were allowed to be a prophecy, or given by inspiration of God, they were at length inserted at the close of this book.

V. 2. Perhaps Lemuel's mother observed in his conduct some indications of a propensity to those evils against which she warned him; and this excited her grief and surprise, and caused her thus to expostulate with him; as if she had said, 'What, my son, shall I have no other recompense for my pain and sorrow, and my care of thy education, no other answer to my prayers and vows, than to see thee enslaved to ruinous lusts, and become a scourge to thy people?' Or the verse may be considered as an animated call to him to attend to her instructions, which sprang from the tenderness of maternal affection: 'What shall I say, my son, the most effectually to impress thy mind? Shall I plead with thee the anguish I have endured for thee? or my early dedication of thee to the Lord, with vows and prayers, or my tender solicitude about thy future welfare?'

V. 3. The company of licentious women tends to enfeeble both body and mind, and to unfit men for the duties of their station. If, then, Lemuel should yield to this temptation, he would be disqualified for the duties of a king. His time and thoughts, which ought to be otherwise employed, would be thus engrossed; and he would gradually be drawn aside into those ways of indolence, indulgence, and negligence, and led to make those sacrifices of the interests of his kingdom, and the affections of his people, to please some favourite concubine, which have, in unnumbered instances, proved destructive to princes, who otherwise had the prospect of reigning happily.

V. 4—7. "It is not for kings, O Lemuel, to drink wine; or for rulers to desire strong drink." Kings and magistrates should be more scrupulously temperate than other men, in proportion to the importance of their offices; for if they cloud their understanding with wine, they will be apt to forget or mistake the statutes by which they should judge, or be induced by designing men to commit injustice. This is the more aggravated, because the poor and afflicted are chiefly injured. Their cause may be deemed worthy of little notice; nay, perhaps decided against them, and even their lives sacrificed to oblige some powerful oppressor, who is the companion of the ruler in his revels. On the contrary, strong drink should be administered as a cordial to those who are ready to faint through weakness, or weariness; and to cheer the spirits of the dejected, that they may be raised above the depressing sense of their poverty and misery.—Some think, that "by him that is ready to perish," the condemned criminals are meant, to whom it was customary to give a draught of wine, or other strong drink, when led to execution.

V. 8, 9. Magistrates ought to be the counsellors and protectors of the oppressed, and of all who are unable or afraid to plead their own cause. They should quash malicious prosecutions, decide in favour of the injured party and detect and expose the oppressor; and thus deliver the poor and needy, who were appointed to destruction, and judge righteously, without respect of persons.—'If thou seest a man in danger to lose his right, because he is not able to make it out; and, through fear or ignorance, or want of elocution, cannot speak for himself; keep not silence, but undertake his defence, especially if it be the cause of strangers, who understand not the laws, and, perhaps, are in danger to suffer some great damage in their bodies, credits, or estates.' (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 10. This description of a virtuous woman forms a kind of poem, containing twenty-two verses, of which each in succession begins with a different letter of the Hebrew alphabet. It seems to have been composed by the mother of Lemuel, and might be intended to direct him in the choice of a wife; but it contains many important lessons to various descriptions of persons in every age. The interrogation implies both the scarceness of such virtuous women, and the happiness of him who hath found one for his wife; (Note, xviii. 22.) The word rendered virtuous, may imply both health and mental endowments, as well as the good dispositions and conduct of the person described. 'The word signifies both strength, (or rather courage), and riches, and virtue. Jethro uses it, Ex. xviii. 21, which we translate able men; and then follows more particularly wherein their ability should consist; "such as fear God, men of truth, hating covetousness." I take, therefore, the word to include a great fear of God, (mentioned afterwards, 30,) which is so powerful, as to endure one with courage to do well, when piety is condemned, nay, laughed at, and abused.' (Bp. Patrick.)—The same word is used when Boaz says to Ruth, "All the city of my people do know that thou art a virtuous woman;" (Ruth, iii. 11;) where the context seems to fix the meaning: for, her unblemished character, her piety and virtue, must be especially intended.—The character is drawn with reference to the usages of those days; but the general outlines are equally suitable to every age and nation. Perhaps it was no more than an ideal picture of feminine excellence; and living characters were to be estimated according to the degree in which they resembled it.

V. 11. The husband of such a wife would so entirely confide in her conjugal fidelity, and in her prudent management, that he could have no jealousy of her, but would trust all his domestic concerns to her without reserve. And every thing being conducted with economy, he would not be tempted to unjust methods of getting gain, as they often are whose affairs are deranged, and whose substance is wasted by an extravagant woman.

V. 12. 'She will endeavour to please him in every thing; and, by avoiding whatever is ungrateful (or disagreeable) to him; nay, by deserving well of him, and studying to promote the interest of him and his family; to maintain his honour and reputation; and that not only by fits and starts, and in a good humour, but all the days of her life; even after he is dead, if she survive him.' (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 13—29. Though we are led to conceive of this virtuous woman as of one in a superior station, and such a wife as Lemuel would be happy in finding; yet she is described as peculiarly industrious, and as taking pleasure in manual labour; rising early to superintend her household, that all might have their provisions in due time, in order to their attendance on their several employments. Her wool, flax, spindle, and distaff, are mentioned to her honour, whilst the delicacy and ornaments of the daughters of Zion are by the prophet recorded to their shame, (Is. iii. 16—26.) By her diligence and good management this virtuous woman is represented as able to provide every thing in abundance, of the best quality, and at the best market; and thus, like the merchants' ships, bringing her food from afar. The gains of her industry enable her to purchase fields, and plant vineyards; and thus also she manages her affairs with prudence and consideration. She does not shrink from labour, but, as exercise gives her strength, so she readily exerts it in any profitable employment. She takes care that all she has to dispose of be completed in the best manner; and that all which she buys be good of the kind: and though she arose early, yet, tasting the pleasure and profit of industry, she is not in haste to retire to rest, but spends the evening, after it is dark, in useful occupations; nay, the whole, or a great part of the night, when the case required it. Yet her diligence springs not from covetousness; but she desires to have enough and to spare for the poor, and her charity is maintained by her industry and frugality. Her family are prepared for the inclemency of the winter, by having double garments, or changes of raiment; clothes in plenty, and suitable to their stations. Her own clothing is good, and becoming her rank, but of her own manufacturing; and her husband is known amongst the assembled elders, by his decent and respectable appearance, and by his cheerful aspect; and, besides all this plenty, she disposes of many very valuable articles to the merchants. Thus her health and vigour of mind are preserved, and her reputation is established; and her life is spent in so useful a manner, that she will be enabled, in time to come, to reflect upon it with comfort. Her conversation, also, is prudent and pious, cheerful and friendly. Kindness dictates, and wisdom directs, all that she says; or she speaks according to the divine law, which requires love and gentleness: and she neither wastes her own time in idleness, nor allows any of her household to do so, nor yet to want any thing that is good for them. Her children, well educated and provided for, grow up to be a credit to her; and repay her attention by their commendations of, and prayers for her; and her husband, with heartfelt satisfaction, expatiates in her praises, saying, with gladness of heart, "Many daughters of Adam and Abraham have done virtuously, but thou excellest them all."—The word virtuously is the same as is used above.

V. 30—31. The favour shewn to young women, on account of external embellishments, or polite accomplishments, or of their wit, gaiety, rank, or wealth; with all the flattering compliments and professions of love made to them, are deceitful, and will soon turn into neglect or disgust, if they do not possess more solid excellencies. And beauty, though so much admired and extolled, is a mere fading vanity; it adds nothing to present happiness; it often covers and augments the deformity of a worthless mind; it exposes the possessor to numberless snares, and proves a dangerous temptation to others; and it soon fades, and leaves nothing but the pride and folly which it fostered, without any foundation for esteem and durable affection; and they who marry a worthless woman on this account, will surely experience how vain it is. But a woman who fears God, and conscientiously attends to the duties of her station, will grow into the esteem and affection of her husband, and acquire merited and durable respect and commendation. Every one ought to behave to her according to the good effects of her conduct to her relations and the community: and she is worthy to be noticed with commendation in the public assemblies of the state, as one whose good works render her peculiarly an useful member of society; and should every tongue be silent, her own conduct will sufficiently manifest her worth, and establish her reputation with all competent judges. Thus is shut up this looking-glass for ladies, which they are desired to open, and dress themselves by; and if they do so, "their adorning will be found to praise, and honour, and glory, at the appearing of Jesus Christ." (Henry.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—9. The affectionate instructions and counsels of prudent and pious mothers may be as useful to the minds of their children, as the tender care of them is to their bodies. And when we consider, that they, who occupy the most important stations in the community, often receive the first impressions from their mothers, which are generally very durable; we shall perceive how much the interest of mankind is connected with the due performance of the maternal duty; and of what importance it is that women be so educated, as to be qualified for such a charge.—Those children, who are early devoted unto God, in baptism, and by fervent prayers, and who have been educated accordingly, may be exhorted and persuaded upon that ground, in accession to their obligations, to the affection and authority of a tender parent; and it behoves them to consider what return they will make to such kind friends, and what use of their salutary admonitions. They, who have the prospect of succeeding to high authority, should be educated and cautioned with the greater care; because their conduct will have so extensive an effect upon others; and they should especially be warned against those vices to which they will certainly be most tempted. Such noble and royal youths are sure to have abundance of flatterers, who will persuade them that their rank authorizes them to indulge their passions, and that they are not to be restricted like their inferiors. It is, therefore, well for them to have affectionate and prudent monitors to inculcate other lessons. For, such princes, as have "given their strength to women," and wine; and as have inflamed their passions, vitiated their judgments, and enfeebled both body and mind by excesses, have not only forgotten the law, perverted judgment, and become tyrants and oppressors; but they have gone into those ways, which have terminated in their ruin: and history abounds with instances of this kind, which are set up as beacons to warn others to shun the rocks on which they split. On the other hand, they who have studied the welfare of their people, and have used their authority to protect the innocent and to defend the oppressed; have best secured their own interest, establishment, and reputation. But if exact temperance and impartial rectitude become kings and judges, they are equally requisite for the ministers of religion: for if they forget the law of God, or pervert his truth, the consequences will be still more dreadful to themselves and others. The many awful instances there have been of promising men, who have been disgraced and ruined by women and wine, should warn every one, who bears the sacred character, to avoid all approaches to, and appearances of, these evils. Every creature of God is good; and strong drink, though wretchedly abused, has yet its use; but instead of wasting it in excess, they, who can afford it, should dispense it to the diseased and the wretched, that by the moderate use of it, they may be refreshed and relieved: "let them drink and forget their poverty, and remember their misery no more." By the same rule, commendation and consolatory topics should be used as cordials to the dejected and tempted. But when they are administered to the confident and self-sufficient, they operate as wine on those who are already intoxicated. And by parity of reason, as magistrates should plead for such as cannot plead for themselves; we should all use the gifts we possess for the benefit of others, to supply their deficiencies, and to preserve them from oppression or destruction.

V. 10—31. As we have repeatedly in this book been warned against the seductions of bad women; there is a peculiar propriety in its concluding with the character and commendations of the virtuous woman; for the confutation of such, as indiscriminately censure the sex, and speak against marriage, though it is God's own institution. In the fallen state of human nature, it is no wonder, that but few, either men or women, are in any good measure what they ought to be; and various causes concur in rendering women what they ought not to be. But it is of vast importance, that a standard should be fixed, by which all, who regard the word of God, may estimate the intrinsic value of the female character. Some there are to be found, who in a good degree answer to this description; yea, many daughters have done virtuously; every one of them is far more valuable than rubies, and happy is he to whom the Lord gives such a prize. Whilst his heart safely trusts in her, she will do him good, in every sense, as long as she liveth; and conduce to his comfort, interest, credit, and safety from snares and temptations. But when we carefully consider this standard of feminine excellency, in which conjugal fidelity, economy, industry, cheerful attention to household affairs, and to the good government of servants and education of children, with a regard to the interests of her husband, are united with charity, piety, wisdom, and the fear of God; in which avarice and extravagance are equally avoided, and the due distance is preserved betwixt penuriousness and waste, betwixt ostentation and slovenly neglect; and in which no mention is made of time spent in those vain amusements and decorations, which seem the only business of multitudes; but the whole life is employed, and the thoughts and conversation occupied about, the duties to be performed to God and man: I say, when this character is well considered, and contrasted with the admired and accomplished females around us; the mind must be impressed with surprise, and led to many interesting enquiries. Numbers in the different ranks of life may be found, any where, except in their own families, or in the house of God: they are adorned with every thing, except wisdom and grace: they affect to know many things, but would not even be thought to understand those which are the proper duties of their station. Nay, they leave even their own offspring to the care of mercenaries, that they may be totally disengaged, and at liberty for vanity and dissipation! But which of the two characters is most amiable, rational, or useful? Which is the best fitted for the important duties of a wife and mother? Indeed, the matter admits not of a question. At first glance we perceive how much ancient simplicity excelled modern refinement: and how far the wisdom of God's word surpasses the devices of men! We cannot but lament, that the modern education of females is such, as seems intended to form them useless triflers, fit only to be gazed upon, or made subservient to amusement and pleasure. And how can they, who spend the night in dissipation, the morning in sleep, and the evening in dressing, "rejoice in time to come," when they review a life so wretchedly wasted? When they grow old, it cannot be expected that the children, whom they neglected for the sake of the most trivial pursuits, will arise up and call them blessed: and in general the hearts of their husbands can by no means trust in them; they are a grief and trouble to them all their days; and they are frequently the only persons from whom they receive no commendation. And what the end of a life thus spent will be, if also thus ended, needs not be told: then at least it will be found, that "favour was deceitful, and beauty vain." But "a woman, that feareth the Lord" will then receive due commendation, and according to the fruit of her hands it will be given her; and her own works will praise her in the gates. Of this honour, which cometh from God, every one ought to be ambitious: and according to this standard we all ought to regulate our judgments. With this before their eyes, let pious parents educate their children, especially their daughters; and let godly men make choice of wives, and value them accordingly: and this description let all women daily study, who desire to be durably beloved and respected, and to fill up their station in the community in an useful and honourable manner.

THE BOOK OF ECCLESIASTES.

The name of this book is taken from the Septuagint, and is a Greek word signifying a preacher, or one who harangues a public congregation. The Hebrew name is Cohemoth, which may either mean, the person who assembles the people, or he who addresses them when assembled.—The book is generally ascribed to Solomon: and it can scarcely be doubted, but that the tradition of the Jews is well grounded; namely, that Solomon wrote it, when brought to deep repentance for the atrocious crimes into which he had been seduced by his idolatrous wives and concubines.—Certain it is, either that Solomon was the writer; or that some other person wrote it, as assuming his character; for many things in it are so peculiarly appropriate to Solomon, that no other man who ever lived could truly speak them. (i. 12. 16. ii. 4—10. vii. 25—28. xii. 9.) But it would be very absurd to suppose, that any inspired writer would use a feigned name and character.—Grotius finds some words in this book, that are not to be met with at all, but in Daniel and Ezra, and the Chaldee interpreters; which makes it probable, he thinks, that it was written after their captivity in Babylon. But supposing Solomon to write here as a penitent, after he had frequented the company of many outlandish women, (1 Kings xi. 1, 2;) it need not seem to us strange that he had learned the use of many of their words.—Besides, in other books of Scripture there are words, for the signification of which we are fain to have resort unto other languages, and particularly the Arabic:—and yet, for all that, they might be pure Hebrew, according to the language which was then spoken.' (Bp. Patrick.)—The nature of this book, which is properly a sermon on a special occasion, precludes the expectation of prophecies in it: nor is there any express quotation from or reference to it, in the other Scriptures, especially in the New Testament, as far as I can recollect, or discover; yet, it is indisputable, that it formed a part of the sacred Canon in the time of our Lord; and the instruction it contains, when well understood, appears quite to coincide with the writings both of the prophets and apostles.—Detached passages, indeed, have been considered as containing unscriptural doctrine, and even such as leads to scepticism and licentiousness; and, no doubt, superficial and carnally-minded men, may "wrest them, as they do other scriptures, to their own destruction;" but they all admit of a sound and useful interpretation, when accurately investigated, and when the general scope of the book is attended to. 'The tendency of this book is excellent, when rightly understood: and Solomon speaks in it with great clearness of the revealed truths of a future state, and universal judgment.' (Grey.)—It is evidently an enquiry after the chief good, or what can make man happy: an enquiry which the most learned, sagacious, and ingenious pagan philosophers often made, but never could solve; but which the inspired preacher hath satisfactorily and finally settled, not merely by authority, or argument, but by the result of his own experiments. A more unexceptionable decision cannot be conceived, whether Solomon's greatness and prosperity, his wisdom and knowledge, or his advantages for making these experiments, and his assiduity in them, be considered.—He had evidently two objects in view. First, to shew where happiness could not be found: and secondly, where it might. 'Whatsoever is vain and perishing cannot make men happy. But all men's designs in this world are vain and perishing; therefore they cannot by prosecuting such designs make themselves happy.'—That which can make a man's mind quiet, still, and calm both in life and death; that alone can make him happy. Now, this the fear of the Lord can do for him, and this alone: therefore this and nothing else can make him a happy man.' (Bp. Patrick.)—The first six chapters are principally employed on the former part of the argument; in which is shewn the vanity of knowledge and wisdom, (apart from true religion,) of mirth and pleasure, of magnificence, prosperity, power, and wealth: yet, some counsels are here interspersed, tending to shew how the vanity, at least the vexation, of each may be abated; and also intimations afforded, that wisdom is far preferable to all other acquisitions, and that a cheerful use of providential blessings is much better than covetousness.—In the second part, from the end of the sixth chapter, the general object of the writer is gradually unfolded; and many important cautions and instructions are given, how to make the best of things as we find them, how to live comfortably and usefully in this evil world, and how to derive benefit from the changing events of life.—Here, indeed, the royal preacher sometimes pauses, to show the vanity of the several things, of which he has occasion to discourse: yet, this part is chiefly employed in teaching us, where and how to seek present comfort and final happiness. In respect of outward things, the sacred writer inculcates a cheerful, liberal, and charitable use of them; without expecting to derive from them any permanent or satisfactory delight. Yet he counsels us to take the transient pleasure, which agreeable circumstances can afford, as far as consists with the fear of God, or true religion; to be patient under unavoidable evils; not to aim at perilous, arduous, or impracticable changes; to fill up the station allotted us, in a peaceable, equitable, and prudent manner; to be contented, meek, and affectionate; to do good abundantly, and to persevere in so doing for the pleasure arising from it, and in expectation of a gracious recompense. These general rules are interspersed with warnings and counsels to princes and great men; and to subjects in respect of their rulers: nor can it be doubted, but that a great part of the vexation of human life is occasioned by the misconduct of men in these particulars.—But the conclusion of the whole matter is this, "Fear God and keep his commandments; for this is the whole of man:" and thus habitually prepare for death and judgment, which will surely and speedily arrive. In fact, it is evident, that Solomon shews the vanity and vexation of all these things, from which idolatrous and apostate men seek happiness, in order to recommend the substantial blessing of true religion; and that, however some parts of his doctrine militates against the traditions of men, or the impositions of Antichrist; none of them, when fairly interpreted, and compared with the context, will be found inconsistent with the doctrines and precepts of Christ and his apostles.

NOTES.

CHAP. I. V. 1. The word rendered preacher, has a feminine termination, though it is used both with a masculine and a feminine verb; but the connection, in several places, confines the meaning of it to the speaker, and not the discourse. In its general meaning, it signifies one who gathereth; that is, one that collects the people together into a congregation, in order to instruct them.—As Solomon, in the preceding book, spake in the name of Wisdom, (which is feminine in the original,) it seems most obvious to consider him as speaking in the same or a similar character, if the feminine termination of the original word be at all regarded. The name of Solomon indeed is not mentioned in 4 One generation passeth away, and another generation cometh; but the earth abideth for ever.

5 The sun also ariseth, and the sun goeth down, and hasteth to his place where he arose.

6 The wind goeth toward the south, and turneth about unto the north: it whirleth about continually; and the wind returneth again according to its circuits.

7 All the rivers run into the sea; yet the sea is not full: unto the place from whence the rivers come, thither they return again.

8 All things are full of labour: man cannot utter it: the eye is not satisfied with seeing, nor the ear filled with hearing.

9 The thing which hath been, it is that which shall be; and that which is done, is that which shall be done: and there is no new thing under the sun.

10 Is there any thing whereof it may be said, See, this is new? it hath been already of old time, which was before us.

12 ¶ I the Preacher was king over Israel in Jerusalem:

13 And I gave my heart to seek and search out by wisdom concerning all things that are done under heaven: this sore travail hath God given to the sons of man, to be exercised therewith.

14 I have seen all the works that are done under the sun; and, behold, all is vanity and vexation of spirit.

15 That which is crooked cannot be made straight; and that which is wanting cannot be numbered.

16 I communed with mine own heart, saying, Lo, I am come to great estate, and have gotten more wisdom than all they that have been before me in Jerusalem: yea, my heart had great experience of wisdom and knowledge.

17 And I gave my heart to know wisdom, and to know madness and folly: I perceived that this also is vexation of spirit.

18 For in much wisdom is much grief: and he that increaseth knowledge increaseth sorrow.

the book, but no other son of David reigned in Jerusalem over Israel, (12 :) Solomon's successors were called kings of Judah, as distinguished from the kings of Israel, or of the revolted tribes; and many things in the book can suit none but Solomon.—These are the words of him who thought the name of a preacher, or public instructor of God's people, no less honourable than that of the son of king David, whom he succeeded in his throne.' (Bp. Patrick.)—Solomon is here called a preacher, or one that assemblh the people, because of his teaching the true knowledge of God, and how men ought to pass their life in this transitory world.'

V. 2. This abrupt proposal of his subject, shews how full Solomon's heart was, and how desirous to impress the reader forcibly with it. He does not say, all things are vain, but that they are vanity in the abstract; yea, vanity of vanities, one complex vanity constituted of numberless vanities: and this he repeats, to shew the certainty of it, and his assurance that the whole is unmixt vanity, and nothing else. All created good, abstracted from its connection with the love and service of God, is unsuitable and insufficient to make us happy, or to do anything effectual towards it: every enjoyment is unsatisfactory, uncertain, and transient, and there is nothing permanent or stable to be found. As God created them, all things were good, and suitable for the end that he intended; but as apostate man abuses and idolizes them, puts them out of their place, and expects that from them which is not in them, they prove empty, and vanish in disappointment and vexation.—He condemns the opinions of all men, who set felicity in any thing but God alone; seeing that in this world all things are vanity and nothing.'

V. 3. "In all labour there is profit," whilst earthly things are subordinated to heavenly: but when a man disturbs that order, no solid good accrues to him from all his care and toil. The ambitious, the covetous, the sensual, nay, the studious, labour for a bubble, a shadow, a chimera, which soon vanishes, and leaves them in darkness and despair.

V. 4-11. The earth indeed, and its productions and affairs, abide nearly the same through successive ages; but it is continually shifting its inhabitants; and what are they the better for all they possessed on earth, when swept away to make room for another generation? The swift approach of death is alone sufficient to prove the vanity of a portion in this world. But the incessant motion of the sun, who yet is but where he was yesterday, or last year, at this time; the shifting of the wind from one point to another, and then back again; and the speedy current of the rivers to join the ocean, which yet is not filled with them, but returns them in various ways to water the earth, to feed the springs, and to supply the rivers, are so many emblems of man's restless state in this world; and lessons to him to spend his span of life in doing the will of his Creator, and in serving his generation. All things here are full of toil and labour, which man cannot describe, explain, or account for; and after all his labours, he is no nearer finding rest than the sun, the wind, or the current of the river, but is hastening to the dust whence he set out, and then his soul will find no rest, if he have not sought it in and from God. Nay, the eye, though wearied and worn out with seeing, and the ear with hearing, are not satisfied; every thing satiates the senses and appetites, and palls them with sameness and tedious repetition, and yet leaves them dissatisfied and craving. Thus men go on from age to age; we find the world the same as our ancestors did, and shall leave it the same to our posterity; and all the new inventions and discoveries that men boast of, are unreal or immaterial. Many things are deemed new through ignorance, men not being aware that the same truths were known, the same errors contended for, the same objects pursued, and the same plans adopted, in former ages, as at present. The learned often know this to be the case, and probably it would be found to be so in still more things, if the records of antiquity had not been lost or mutilated. In particular, he who is but moderately acquainted with ecclesiastical history, will scarcely find one modification of religious opinion, amidst the endless variety of modern days, which may not be matched with something of the same kind in ancient times. Upon the whole, it is the same scene over and over again: so that there is scarcely any thing of which it may be said, "see this is new," but it hath been already in old times, though there may be no remembrance of former things: and thus in like manner, many modern inventions and conclusions will hereafter be exploded and forgotten. It is, however, certain that there is nothing new discovered, which can prevent the world from being that same vain vexatious place that it was found in former ages.

V. 12-18. After this exordium, the preacher proceeds to a more particular account of himself and his subjects. Being king over Israel in Jerusalem, he desired wisdom and knowledge, in order to a proper discharge of his high and important trust; and he applied himself heartily, and with all the powers of his capacious understanding, to learn every thing that had been done under heaven, as far as it was discoverable by him. For God hath so ordered it, that even knowledge must be acquired with sore labour and travail by the sons of men; which, however, tends to exercise and employ their minds in a salutary manner, and serves to humble them, as some render the words. Or the clause may mean that Solomon searched out the nature and causes of that sore labour and travail with which God exercises the children of men. The result of this enquiry, however, was, that when he had considered all the works done under the sun, he found them not only to be vanity, but vexation of spirit: anxious cares and insipid pleasures ending in bitter disappointments. For no human power, sagacity, or industry, can rectify the crookedness of men's dispositions and behaviour; or cure worldly enjoyments of their vanity; or supply, or even number up, those things which are wanting to felicity. These subjects Solomon pondered in his own mind with serious attention, and considering that he had both riches, authority, capacity, and leisure, he was determined to examine critically the different pursuits from which men expected happiness. And in the first place he purposed to examine the difference between the enjoyments of such as sought knowledge, and studied the rules of prudence and natural wisdom, and the pleasures of those who lived at their ease, and minded nothing but sensual mirth and indulgence; which was generally deemed to be madness and folly, and yet had many advocates. But he found the very investigation of the subject to be vexatious; and he was convinced, that there was no solid satisfaction on either side. For even the pursuit of knowledge and wisdom only made distressing discoveries to him of man's wickedness and misery; so that the more he knew, the more he saw cause to lament and mourn; and at the same time, the increase of knowledge rendered the mind more susceptible of painful feelings, and aggravated the guilt of him who continued impenitent.—We must remember that the wisdom which cometh from God, and leads to him, and which is the whole of man, is excepted from the general charge of vanity. And all other wisdom and knowledge, abstracted from their connection with it, and subserviency to it, are indeed vain and vexatious.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1-11. None are more capable of shewing the evil and misery of sin, than they who have been very guilty, and then become deeply penitent; and they generally are very desirous to warn their fellow-sinners, and to call them also to repentance. In like manner, none are so well qualified to preach the vanity of worldly things, as they who have had an opportunity of giving them a full trial, and then renounce them all for the comforts of true religion; and if kings, whose examples prove them to be in earnest, would discourse on this topic to their subjects, they would be the most unexceptionable of all preachers; nor would it be any degradation to their characters, nay, in the judgment of angels, who "rejoice over one sinner that repenteth," they would then appear more truly honourable, than when heading victorious armies, haranguing assembled nobles, or seated on the throne of judgment. For, to the calm reflection of a believer, who hath run the circuit of earthly good, and is brought back from his wanderings, and then from the verge of the eternal world looks round upon the crowds which throng the court, the city, the change, the theatre, what doth it all appear but vanity? Imperial sceptres, high-sounding titles, flattering panegyrics, renowned achievements, are as mere a vanity as the rest of the shadowy possessions and enjoyments of life. The whole is vanity of vanities, the vainest of vanities, and nothing more. If this world, in its present state, were all, it would not be worth living for; but what shall we say, when for the sake of such shadows, eternal happiness is forfeited, and eternal misery deserved! "What profit then have ungodly men of all their labour, which they take under the sun?" As far as this world is concerned, we are sensible, that all former generations have laboured only for a grave. The present race of men are treading in their steps; soon the same observations will be made over us; and if we have our good things on earth, it had been better for us that we had never been born. If indeed, like the sun, we rejoice to run our course of duty, and make haste to fill up our measure of services to our generation, according to the will of God, and then seek our rest in him; the shortness of human life, and the vanity of the world, will be no loss to us. But if we seek our happiness, and attempt to take our rest on earth, where all things are full of labour, we shall at last be but where we set out; all our toil and inquietude will be in vain, and we must then go and give an account of ourselves to God our Creator and Judge. We cannot alter this state of things, which is the effect of man's apostasy, and of the wrath of God against his sins; our wisdom therefore consists in accommodating ourselves to it, and in ceasing to expect satisfaction here, where every short-lived enjoyment either palls and nauseates through excess, or grows insipid through repetition. For no discovery has yet been made of any new source of pleasure or happiness, which is exempt from vanity and vexation; after all our boasted improvements, the world is the same discontented, disappointed place, that men complained of in former ages, and it will be the same when we are gone, or forgotten, like those former things of which there is no remembrance.

V. 12-18. It behoves all men, as well as kings and preachers, to apply their hearts, and the abilities which God hath given them, to find out that wisdom and knowledge which is connected with their duties in the community. Yet, in the present state of things, even this is a sore labour and travail; and the more we read, hear, or observe of all the works that are done under the sun, the more evil and misery we become acquainted with. We discover calamities which we cannot relieve, errors which we cannot rectify, and vices which we cannot reform, besides those crooks in our own lot which we cannot straighten, and those obliquities in our dispositions, and manifold defects in our own characters, which we feel ourselves unable fully to remove. Communing with own hearts on these subjects will serve the more deeply to convince us, that neither wealth, authority, nor wisdom, even if they exceeded those of Solomon, could alter these things. And it is madness and folly to expect that satisfaction from madness and folly which wisdom and learning fail to confer on their disciples. Yet that libertines and epicures might have no plea left them; and that no man might be enticed by them to make the perilous experiment, in order to a decision of the question, we have it here made by Solomon, and to the greatest advantage; and, as might have been expected, he found it "vexation of spirit." Whilst at the same time, he excludes the wise and learned from their boastings also; seeing, with all his unparalleled wisdom and knowledge, he assures us, "that in much wisdom is much grief, and that he that increaseth knowledge increaseth sorrow." Let us then learn to hate and fear sin, the cause of all this vanity and misery; to value Jesus Christ, by whom we may return to God and happiness; to despise and renounce this vain world; and to seek our rest in the knowledge, love, and service of God our Saviour.

NOTES.

CHAP. II. V. 1, 2. Solomon having found learning, with all its discoveries, to be labour, sorrow, and disappointment, deliberately proceeded to make trial of mirth and pleasure, in order to find out the happiest course of life. We may now, therefore, imagine him surrounded with the most witty, gay, and dissipated of his courtiers and subjects; and endeavouring to relax his mind, and dissipate his cares, by jollity and laughter. But he soon found this also to be vanity. Upon reflection, he "said of laughter, it is mad." For a rational creature to indulge in excessive mirth was a voluntary insanity, which rendered him for the time devoid of reason, and the object of pity or contempt, which betrayed him into foolish actions, and entailed on him many painful consequences. And what at last could this noisy flashy mirth do towards making a man happy?

vants born in my house; <sup>a</sup>also I had great possessions of great and small cattle, above all that were in Jerusalem before me;

8 I gathered me also <sup>b</sup>silver and gold, and the peculiar treasure of kings and of the provinces; I gat me <sup>c</sup>men-singers and women-singers, and the delights of the sons of men, <sup>d</sup>as <sup>e</sup>musical instruments, and that of all sorts.

9 So <sup>f</sup>I was great, and increased more than all that were before me in Jerusalem: also my wisdom remained with me.

10 And <sup>g</sup>whatsoever mine eyes desired I kept not from them; I withheld not my heart from any joy; for <sup>h</sup>my heart rejoiced in all my labour: and this was my portion of all my labour.

11 Then <sup>i</sup>I looked on all the works that my hands had wrought, and on the labour that I had laboured to do: and, <sup>j</sup>behold, all <sup>k</sup>was vanity and vexation of spirit, and <sup>l</sup>there was no profit under the sun.

12 ¶ And <sup>m</sup>I turned myself to behold wisdom, and madness, and folly: for what <sup>n</sup>can the man do that cometh after the king? <sup>o</sup>even that which hath been already done.

For on trial it was found to be little more than the affectation or hypocrisy of pleasure: a forced appearance of joy, concealing an aching heart, and increasing its anguish and remorse when it subsided.

V. 3. The royal preacher next devised to make a critical experiment of the pleasures of wine, which have been so much celebrated by licentious poets. He therefore determined to indulge his sensual appetite, and see what it could do for him. But yet he acquainted himself with wisdom: either he devoted the former part of the day to study and business, and then indulged himself in the evening; or he conducted the experiment with wisdom, and did not disorder himself by running into great excesses; or he endeavoured to take his knowledge and wisdom along with him, (so to speak,) that he might estimate the degree of satisfaction to be found in drinking: thus attempting to lay hold on folly in a wise manner, and for a wise end, namely, that he might discover which of the pursuits of men was worthy of the decided preference, and ought for that reason to be adhered to all the days of man's life on earth.

V. 6. The wood, &c. Or, the nurseries and plantations in which all sorts of trees were raised. These, Solomon, doubtless at vast expense, contrived to water in dry seasons, from pools, which, at the same time, seem to have been replenished with fish, and to have greatly added to the magnificence of the scene.—These great works constituted his next experiment in pursuit of happiness; or in seeking after the chief good, about which the heathens had almost three hundred different opinions.

V. 8. Musical, &c. The original words thus translated, are used in no other part of Scripture; and the meaning of them is much doubted. Some derive them from the verb which signifies to take captive. 'The delights of the sons of men, as a woman taken captive, and women taken captive.' (Old Testament.) And though Solomon had no wars in the former part of his reign, yet, the number of women of different countries, which he had collected for wives and concubines, as conquerors generally selected the most beautiful captives for themselves, may, perhaps, be intended; for, certainly, that seems to have been one of his experiments, and as it was in itself the most dangerous and sinful, so it proved the most pernicious of them all.

V. 9-11. Solomon made trial of all these pleasures and pursuits, without stupifying his faculties, or rendering himself unfit for business, or serious studies. Though he dreadfully forsook the service of God, yet he did not neglect the affairs of his kingdom; nor was he bereaved of his wisdom, as Samson had been of his strength. Yet he freely indulged himself in every pleasure, and possessed himself of every object, that his eye or his heart desired; having it in his power to compass all his wishes, and being determined to give every thing a fair trial. Whilst he was pursuing his schemes, he had, indeed, a momentary pleasure in beholding them advancing to their completion; but this was all. When they were finished, the novelty was over, the sameness made them vain, his cares and disappointments rendered them vexatious, and all his improvements entirely failed of affording him satisfaction.

V. 12-17. In search of his grand object, Solomon next resorted to his design of comparing wisdom and knowledge with madness and folly, in order to discover which could do the most towards rendering man happy. He was sure that no one could repeat the experiment to better advantage than he; whether learning, wisdom, mirth, pleasure, magnificence, riches, or any other object, were proposed, none could do more than repeat what the most renowned and prosperous king of Israel had done before him. Upon this deliberate survey, he found, indeed, that knowledge and prudence in affairs were preferable to ignorance and folly, even as light excelleth darkness. For the wise man goes about his work, as one whose eyes are open, and fitted for their use, and who can distinguish the surrounding objects, and those at a distance; but the fool blunders on as if he were blind, or in the dark, and is continually doing mischief, and running into trouble. Yet one event happeneth to them all. The wise cannot find solid happiness any more than the fool. As to the troubles and anxieties of life, and pain, sickness, and death, no wisdom or learning can ward them off; so that Solomon himself, in respect of the most important temporal concerns, was upon a level with his meanest subject; his

14 The *wise man's eyes are in his head; but the fool walketh in darkness: and I myself perceived also that *one event happeneth to them all.

15 Then said I in my heart, As it happeneth to the fool, so it happeneth *even to me; *and why was I then more wise? *Then I said in my heart, that this also is vanity.

16 For *there is no remembrance of the wise more than of the fool for ever; seeing that which now is, in the days to come shall all be forgotten. And *how dieth the wise man? as the fool.

17 Therefore *I hated life; because the *work, that is wrought under the sun is grievous unto me: *for all is vanity and vexation of spirit.

18 ¶ Yea, *I hated all my labour which I had *taken under the sun: because *I should leave it unto the man that shall be after me.

19 And *who knoweth whether he shall be a wise man or a fool? yet shall he have rule over all my labour wherein I have laboured, and wherein I have shewed myself *wise under the sun. This is also vanity.

20 Therefore I went about *to cause my heart to despair of all the labour which I took under the sun.

21 For there is a man, *whose labour is in wisdom, and in knowledge, and in equity; yet to a man that hath not laboured therein shall he *leave it for his portion. This also is vanity and a great evil.

22 For what *hath man of all his labour, *and of the vexation of his heart, wherein he hath laboured under the sun?

23 For *all his days are sorrows, and his travail grief; yea, *his heart taketh not rest in the night. This is also vanity.

25 For *who can eat, or who else can hasten hereunto, more than I?

26 For God giveth to a man, that is good *in his sight, *wisdom, and knowledge, and joy: but *to the sinner he giveth travail, to gather and to heap up, that he may give to him that is good before God. This also is vanity and vexation of spirit.

wisdom and knowledge were, in this view, a mere vanity, and his labour in pursuing them seemed altogether lost. He observed, also, that when a wise man died, he was commonly forgotten or neglected, with his maxims, devices, and performances; so that, if it was asked, "How dieth the wise man?" It may be answered, "As the fool." These reflections rendered him weary of life, and of all its employments; as he found every thing "to be vanity and vexation." We suppose this to have been Solomon's experience, whilst he was seeking satisfaction in the world, and before he began to return back to God and his service.

V. 18-23. Solomon next considered what would become of his wealth, buildings, and improvements, after his decease. He had, indeed, a son to succeed him in his kingdom; but who knew whether he would prove a wise man or a fool? and he seems to have perceived that Rehoboam was not likely to inherit his wisdom, or to preserve that prosperity in which he left his kingdom. Yet, having rule over all his labour, in which he had shewed his diligence and wisdom, he would have it in his power to overturn the whole. This reflection so disquieted his mind, that he desired to bring himself to despair of deriving good from all his labours about those things, "which are under the sun;" seeing, that having bestowed great pains to establish the affairs of his kingdom in wisdom, knowledge, and equity, his successor, who entered upon it without any labour of his own, might destroy all by his neglect or imprudence. This Solomon saw to be a great evil in the affairs of men, which could not be rectified; by means of which, the incessant labour and care of man, by day and night, only produces proportionable sorrow and vexation.—"And yet, such is our folly, there is no end of our cares; for we see many *man whose life is nothing but *mere drudgery; who never is at leisure to enjoy any thing that he hath, but still engaged in one troublesome employment or other, to get more; which he follows so eagerly, as if it were his business to vex and disquiet himself.—Not content with his daily toils, he racks his mind also with cares in the night. This is so void of all reason, that nothing can be imagined more vain and foolish." (Bp. Patrick).—"I went about to make mine heart *abhor all the labour, wherein I had travailed under the sun; *that I might seek the true felicity which is in God."

V. 24-26. The result of these experiments of the preacher was this, that, instead of ceaseless cares about getting and hoarding, nothing could be found under the sun which deserved to be preferred to a cheerful and liberal use of the fruits of a man's labours. Yet, even this was the gift of God; and, without dependence on him, a man must be disappointed even here: for who could bestow more attention to it, or have more advantages for it, than he had possessed? and yet he missed of the comfort of his prosperity when he was wandering from God and his duty. But when a man is accepted of the Lord, and does that which he approves, he gives him true wisdom, knowledge, and joy; a peaceful conscience, a contented and thankful mind, a joyful hope, and solid satisfaction in the knowledge and love of him: and by teaching him to conduct his labours, and use his good things in a pious, charitable, temperate, and sober manner, he enables him to rejoice in all the works of his hands, and in the abundance of good conferred on him. But to the sinner God allots labour and sorrow, vanity and vexation, in seeking a worldly portion, which yet afterwards comes into better hands. (Marg. Ref.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1-17. The manifold devices of men in order to derive satisfaction from the world, and their incessant changing from one thing to another, resemble the restlessness of one in a fever, who supposes his uneasiness to arise from his situation, though, in fact, it is the effect of his disease. If we could make full trial of every thing under the sun, and should determine to prove our hearts with mirth, and bid them enjoy pleasure in all its seducing forms, we should soon be constrained to say, "Behold, this also is vanity!" The devotees of gay and social life are themselves sensible of its emptiness. They cannot but feel that immoderate laughter is a kind of madness, and "as to mirth, what doeth it?" they know, that frequently in the midst of their tumultuous joys, their hearts are uneasy; and that their laughter is commonly succeeded by proportionable languor and dejection, and ends in disappointment; and often occasions them painful reflections in their short intervals of solitude. Nor can the pleasures of wine in the least prevent; nay, they will infallibly aggravate these evils. Not to repeat what hath been said of excess of drinking; (Notes, &c. Prov. xxiii. 29-35;) even they who conduct their pleasures with more prudence and moderation, and pay some regard to health, reputation, and interest, whilst they "lay hold of folly," will be miserably disappointed, if they expect to find in this indulgence, "that good for the sons of men which they should do under heaven, all the days of their life." And if men have wealth, taste, and inclination, and can make trial of more expensive pursuits, (without injuring their circumstances, as many do,) they will find them also vanity and vexation. When the lower order in society behold the rich and noble making great works, building magnificent houses, laying out gardens, parks, and plantations, forming canals and fishponds, and whatever can be devised for luxury or embellishment; when they see them surrounded with a number of servants, possessed of large estates, and abundance of gold and silver, and collecting from every province its peculiar treasure, even all that is most curious, beautiful, and valuable, of statues, pictures, furniture, jewels, and whatever the eye can lust after, with musical instruments, (those delights of the sons of men,) to soothe the ear, and charm the mind; and when they see all this confluence of earthly good in the possession of one who neither runs into ruinous excess, nor yet withholds his heart from any joy, and who, amidst all, retains a reputation for wisdom, and manages his concerns with discretion; I say, when the poor witness such scenes, they can scarcely help mistaking this glare of prosperity for solid happiness; and they will be apt to covet, envy, and complain. But could they feel exactly as the possessor does, probably their envy might be turned into compassion. Thus, when strangers take a transient survey of such scenes of magnificence, where every object excites admiration, they are apt to associate the idea of happiness with that of the possessor; when, perhaps, he is filled with vexation and disappointment, and receives not, during a course of years, half that pleasure from his magnificence that they enjoy in one hour. Indeed, whilst the plans are forming, or the idea of increasing and supereminent greatness and renown float before the mind; and whilst improvements are making, and something new every day excites the attention, there is a degree of joy in a man's labour and success, and this he has for his fading portion. But when his designs are finished, and he vainly hopes to be repaid for all his trouble, care, and expense, he "looks on all that his hands have wrought, and behold all is vanity and vexation of spirit; so that there is no profit under the sun." And if the richest, wisest, and most prosperous of kings, could find nothing but vanity and vexation in all his possessions and enjoyments, what can any man do that cometh after him, and determines to repeat the same experiment? We must not, indeed, place mad mirth, intemperance, and folly, upon a level with the liberal arts, useful learning, or economical or political wisdom. The former are evil in themselves, the others are good, except when misplaced, idolized, and abused. So that even this "wisdom excelleth folly, as far as light excelleth darkness." A man's knowledge and prudence, like the eyes in his head, preserve him from many temporal evils into which he will fall who walketh in darkness and ignorance; and they enable him to be respectable in, and useful to, the community. Yet, in the grand concerns, one event happeneth to them both; the advantages of wisdom are precarious and transient; and the most sagacious of men, who dies a stranger to Jesus Christ, will perish equally with the most ignorant, and often with peculiar aggravations; so that this is vanity, and worse than vanity. And the imaginary advantage of being honoured after death is as uncertain as it is vain. Perhaps even Solomon, with all his glory, would have long since been forgotten, or his history distorted by fable, if he had not been made partaker of divine wisdom, and placed as king over God's people, and honoured as a writer of the sacred Scriptures. And what is this bubble, which so many covet, and so few obtain? What good can commendations on earth do the body in the grave, or the soul in hell? And can the spirits of just men made perfect at all need them? It would, indeed, be as well if there were in no case any remembrance of the wise man, more than of the fool, except as survivors are the better for his wisdom. So that, if this were all, we might be tempted to hate our life, with all the fruitless toil and work that is done under the sun; as "it is all vanity and vexation of spirit."

V. 18—26. One main pretence of worldly men, in excuse for their eager pursuit of vanity, is, that they are providing for their children: but this can afford a reflecting man no solid satisfaction; nay, indeed, it must generally add to the vanity and vexation derived from other sources. For the uncertainty which there must be, what use they will make of their riches, and whether they will behave wisely or foolishly, when they come to have much in their power; and the fears lest it should do them harm and not good, and to multitudes by their means; may make a worldly man hate all his labour under the sun. Soon it must all pass into other hands; who perhaps will subvert all his schemes, waste all his treasures, and destroy all those works in which he fancied that he had shewn himself wise: nay, supposing he has laboured in wisdom, knowledge, and equity, to establish beneficial regulations; the man, to whom he leaves it for a portion, perhaps overturns all by his vice and folly, before he is well cold in his grave. This is also vanity, and a sore evil; enough to make a man cause his heart to despair of all his labour about worldly things. For what hath man of all his labour, and the vexation of his heart; for all his toilsome days and anxious nights; but sorrow and grief? Indeed, worldly things were never intended for any thing more and better, than to supply our bodily wants, and our expectation of more from them is the main cause of this vanity. To eat and drink to the moderate satisfaction of our appetites, is so far good; and there is nothing better for man of earthly enjoyment; these, the animals share to greater advantage, but the rational soul requires some better portion. No wonder then, that when man mistakes this for his intended good, he is restless and dissatisfied, and prone to excess; so that he cannot attain to the comfortable use of the creatures, without the special gift of God: even though he had Solomon's wisdom and wealth, and hasted to it as much as he did. In order to attain this, and every other good, we must first seek and labour for those things which are above, and not for those under, the sun; and having found acceptance with God, and being good in his sight, we shall receive from him wisdom and knowledge, productive of solid joy. Then we shall not have any cause to hate our life, or our labour, nor to sit down in despondency; but leaving our children, and all our concerns, with the Lord, we may cheerfully attend to the duties of our station, pass through life without anxious cares; avoid much of its vanity and vexation, by the exercise of faith, patience, and joyful hope; and "abound in the work of the Lord, as knowing that our labour shall not be in vain in the Lord." We shall not need to covet wealth or honour; but "having food and raiment, shall learn to be therewith content," and to use what God giveth to his glory, with thankful hearts: and at length shall leave the world in a very different manner from the fool, and the worldly-wise man. So that the vanity and vexation spoken of belongs only to men as sinners, and is confirmed to them as unbelievers; to the most prudent and prosperous of whom God giveth travail, as his portion: he toils and labours to gather and to heap up; and the real benefit of all his care and pains, and the sum total of all the enjoyment, even of this life, devolves "to him that is good before God." To all others there is "vanity and vexation;" but "to him that soweth righteousness shall be a sure reward."

7 A time to rend, and a time to sew; a time to keep silence, and a time to speak;

8 A time to love, and a time to hate; a time of war, and a time of peace.

9 What profit hath he that worketh, in that wherein he laboureth?

10 I have seen the travail, which God hath given to the sons of men, to be exercised in it.

11 He hath made every thing beautiful in his time: also he hath set the world in their heart, so that no man can find out the work that God maketh, from the beginning to the end.

12 I know that there is no good in them, but for a man to rejoice, and to do good in his life.

13 And also that every man should eat and drink, and enjoy the good of all his labour, it is the gift of God.

14 I know that whatsoever God doeth, it shall be for ever: nothing can be put to it, nor any thing they are so fluctuating and uncertain. There is a season and a time for every one of God's purposes to take place in this lower world; and for us to perform the several parts of our duty, and prepare for the future: and we cannot anticipate or retard those appointed seasons, by any of our contrivances or labours. Thus, there was a time, in the purposes of God, for our birth; and there is another for our death; known to him, but unknown to us. There are times in which nations and families are planted and take root; and then there are means to be used, duties to be performed, and comforts to be shared: but there are also times, in which God plucks up that which was planted, and no human wisdom can prevent it; and then we are called to the submission, and to the duties, of an afflicted state. In like manner he cuts off our dear friends or relatives, or heals us, or them, in his own time; he breaks down our established prosperity, or builds it up like a city recovered from its ashes; he calls us to weep and mourn, or to rejoice and dance for gladness; to raise trophies of victory, or to scatter the monuments of success under severe calamities, in his own time and manner. He also causes friends and relatives to meet in comfort, and with mutual endearments: at other times, they are either separated, or sorrow makes it seasonable for them to refrain from embracing, or circumstances call them to other duties. There are also times, when men get wealth with ease, and keep it without difficulty: at other times, no prudence can preserve them from the most ruinous losses; nay, they will be glad to cast away all their wealth, to save their lives. At some times men are called to rend their clothes in sorrow; at others, to prepare the garments worn on joyful occasions: at some seasons awful afflictions stop their mouths; at others, unexpected deliverances open them to speak the praises of God, and to express the gladness of their hearts. At one time they meet with kindness which excites their love; at another, with injuries which tempt them to resentment and hatred. So that nations experience times when they must wage war, as well as opportunities for the renewal of peace; nor can individuals at all seasons shun dispute and contention. To expect stable happiness in such an unstable world, must ensure disappointment. But to imitate the sailors, who keep the port in view all their voyage, and avail themselves of fine weather and fair winds; yet expect and prepare for storms and various hinderances and hardships, and accommodate their conduct to their circumstances, forms man's duty and wisdom in this changing world. Otherwise all his toil and labour will be vain and vexatious; and this God hath appointed to the fallen sons of men, for their discipline, correction, and humiliation. But, however this state of things may appear to us, every one of these dispensations is beautiful in its season: and when the whole plan of God shall be finished, it will appear to have been altogether wise, just, and good. Yet by reason of our situation in this world, about which our time and thoughts are so much taken up, no man can find out all the work that God maketh, from the beginning to the end: so that to us it will often appear disjointed and confused.—Solomon here illustrates: The imperfection of human wisdom, which is confined to a certain season, for all things which it would effect; which if we neglect or let slip, all our contrivance signifies nothing.—The perfection of our wisdom consists, First, in being contented in this order wherein God hath placed all things; and not disquieting ourselves about that which it is not in our power to remedy: Secondly, in taking the fittest opportunity of doing every thing, as the most certain means of tranquillity: Thirdly, in taking the comfort of what we have at present, and making a seasonable and legitimate use of it; and, lastly, in bearing the vicissitudes, which we find in all human affairs, with an equal mind.' (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 12—15. 'Wherefore long consideration and experience assure me, that, leaving these fruitless enquiries and vexatious cares about the future; the only happiness that is in our power is to make the best of our present condition;—being solicitous for nothing in this world, but to obtain good hope in God, by living piously and virtuously, and by doing good to others with what we have: and this not remissly and by fits, but seriously and constantly as long as we live.' (Bp. Patrick.)—Indeed, the chief advantage of worldly possessions consists in the pleasure which arises from doing good with them, and in using moderately and cheerfully the fruit of our labour; which is the gift of God. It would be madness to think of altering the decrees of God: his appointments cannot be frustrated or disconcerted; nothing can be added to or taken from them; but they remain for ever as he hath purposed them: and he orders all things in that manner, which is best suited to bring men to stand in awe of his power and wrath, and to reverence his glorious majesty. There is also an uniformity in the vast variety of his dispensations: the same scenes are exhibited over again to successive generations; and God, as it were, recalls those judgments and mercies which had been employed on former occasions. So that his dealings with individuals, and with collective bodies, from age to age, make the same displays of his divine perfections.—It is a very great plague to be discontented that things go otherwise than we desire: for certain it is that God hath settled them by such an eternal and immutable law, that it is not in the power of man to make the least alteration. Therefore, we must alter ourselves, and not murmur that we cannot change the course of things; but be happy, by reverent submission to the Divine government; and a due care not to offend the Divine majesty, whose will shall be done one way or other; if not by us, yet upon us. For we are subject to no other laws, than those by which God hath governed the world from the beginning.' (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 16, 17. Solomon here more directly reverts to his subject, namely, the vanity of earthly distinctions or possessions. Men are very ambitious of power and authority, and these are deemed important acquisitions: yet they who obtain them, commonly, more or less, abuse them; and instead of administering justice, are guilty of oppression and iniquity. And as God will surely call both the righteous and the wicked to an account for their works; so their exaltation frequently proves the occasion of their more aggravated condemnation: for as this is a time of the Lord's patience, speedily the time of his vengeance will arrive; seeing there is a time for every purpose and every work.—In the mean while, however, the iniquity perpetrated under the colour of law and justice exceedingly enhances the vanity of the world, by turning the principal outward remedy against misery into an engine of torture. And Solomon seems to have felt that even a wise and righteous prince could not prevent this; as he must leave so much to be done by others, and cannot secure, in general, the impartial execution of justice, however ardently he may desire it.

V. 18-21. Some think that these verses contain the objections of some infidels to Solomon's doctrine of the righteous judgment of God. But the construction requisite to make out this meaning, appears to me perplexed. Solomon seems to have expressed the wish of his heart, concerning the estate of the sons of men, especially that of powerful oppressors, that God would manifest it unto them, and cause them duly to consider it; that they might perceive, that by choosing this world as their portion, they reduce themselves to a level with the beasts, without being, like them, exempted from present vexation and a future account. For that, which befalleth the sons of men, respecting mere animal pleasures or pains, befalleth also beasts. Both live, and breathe, and die alike, and go to the same place, and return to the dust whence they were taken. So that, in these things, man hath no pre-eminence above the beast; for all is vanity. As none can fully comprehend, so, few consider properly, the difference between the rational soul of man, which after the death of the body, returns to God, and enters upon an eternal state of happiness or misery; and the spirit, or life, of the beast which is extinct with the body when it returns to the earth. And for want of attending to this, men forfeit their real and vast pre-eminence, and expose themselves to final and eternal misery.

V. 22. Wherefore, &c. In the midst of all this disappointment and vexation, the best thing that a man can do, is to "exercise himself to have a conscience void of offence towards God and man;" returning to God through Jesus Christ, relying on his mercy, and rejoicing to do his duty. This will give him a humble confidence and a joyful hope, which is his present portion, and the earnest of his future happiness. And he will not want to know, as indeed it would be vain to enquire of any one concerning, the things which are coming upon him, in the intervening years or days of his life.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

In this changing world our proper comfort lies in the expectation of unchangeable happiness in heaven. How wretched then are they, who have nothing to hope, and every thing to fear, beyond the grave! In that world, to which the believer is hastening, there will be no more death or sickness, no more plucking up or breaking down, no weeping and mourning, no losing or scattering, no hatred, envy, or war; but eternal peace, and love, and joy complete, yet still receiving continual accessions. Whilst we continue on this stormy ocean, let us cast anchor within the veil; and let us seize the favourable opportunity for every good purpose and work. As the time for our being born is past, so the time for us to die is speedily approaching: in the interval there is a season allotted to us to work out our own salvation, and to do good to our brethren. If it had not been for sin, there would not have been a time for death; if it had not been for Christ, we must have died without hope. Our sins bring upon us all our personal, domestic, and public calamities; to Christ we owe all our comforts. Let us then learn to acknowledge the hand of God in all the varying scenes of life; to submit to his justice without murmuring, to humble ourselves for sin, to seek the supports of his grace, and to hope for returning comforts: if he please to pluck up, or to break down our prosperity, and to wither our gourds; if he call us to mourning and weeping, to rending our garments and girding ourselves with sackcloth; if he mar our enjoyments, bereave us of our substance, or expose us to bitter enemies. And on the other hand, if the Lord be pleased to plant, to build up, and to heal our wounds, to give us peace, and cause us to rejoice; if he send accessions of property or of kind friends, or to render relative endearments comfortable to us: let us beware that we do not trust the transient calm; but in the day of prosperity let us prepare for adversity, in the time of love for enmity, in the time of peace for war, in the time of health for sickness, and in the time of life for death. In the mean while let us receive the present comfort with gratitude, and bear the transient affliction with patience: let us diligently attend to the duty and accommodate ourselves to the circumstances of the present time; and expect our happiness, not from this changing world, but from an unchangeable God. But if we reverse this order, it will still recur to be enquired, "What profit hath he, that worketh in that wherein he labourereth?" Nay, the more men see of the world around them, the more they will "witness the travail, which God hath given to the sons of men to be exercised in it." Yet let us not rashly censure the appointments of God; every thing, which he hath planned and executed is perfectly fitted to its time, place, and occasion, and is beautiful in its season. But in such a world as this, where our needful employments are so many; and with such hearts as ours, which are so needlessly set upon and careful about earthly things, no wonder that we are not able to find out all the works of God, and to see the reasons and the glory of them. To believe, obey, and submit is our part on earth; and not to comprehend the deep things of God. We should be daily occupied in doing good to all around us, as we have ability; and this would render our own temporal comforts doubly sweet to us; for indeed it is the only good in them. We should also avoid the extremes of avarice and extravagance, in the use of our substance; and should continually seek wisdom and grace from God, that we may properly "eat and drink, and enjoy the good of all our labour;" without disquieting ourselves about the everlasting and most perfect appointments of God. Rather let us fear before him, and reverence his wisdom, justice, and power; being assured that he deals with all his creatures in every age, by the same unerring rules. Leaving these matters therefore to the Lord, we should take the place, and do the work, assigned us. Nor need we desire eminent stations, which so often tempt men to atrocious wickedness, and expose them to severe judgments. And should we not only witness, but suffer from, iniquity being found in the place of judgment, we need not faint; for the time of deliverance for the oppressed, and for vengeance on the oppressor, will soon arrive. Rather let us pray for our poor besotted fellow-sinners around us, that the Lord would shew them their real condition, and not leave them to their wickedness, as brute beasts that have no understanding. Surely the case of those who are so desirous of living like beasts, that the height of their hopes and wishes is, that they may die like them, is most deplorable. And yet must they be disappointed in this their grovelling expectation. Indeed as to the body, there is no great difference at present; both must return to the dust. But who can describe the difference when the soul of man leaves the body, and enters upon an eternal state of unmixed joy or sorrow; whilst the beast dies, to live no more? Though we cannot fully explain this matter, yet, believing the word of God, we may know enough, to convince us, that our business on earth is to seek future happiness; and embracing the salvation of the gospel, to be zealous of, and rejoice in, all those good works which are the evidences of faith and love. If we choose this as our portion, we shall be safe for eternity; though no one can tell us what shall befall us hereafter during life, or what will come upon our family or country after we are gone.

CHAP. IV.

The miseries arising from oppression; and the vanity resulting from envy, idleness, and avarice, 1-3. The advantages of friendship and social affections, 4-12. The vanity of royal dignity, through the folly of princes, and the fickleness of their subjects, 13-16.

SO <sup>a</sup>I returned, <sup>b</sup>and considered all the oppressions that are done under the sun: and behold <sup>c</sup>the tears of such as were oppressed, and <sup>d</sup>they had no comfort; and on the side of their oppressors there was <sup>e</sup>power; but they had no comfort.

2 Wherefore <sup>f</sup>I praised the dead which are already dead, more than the living which are yet alive.

8 There is <sup>o</sup>'one alone, and <sup>p</sup>there is not a second; yea, <sup>q</sup>'he hath neither child nor brother; yet <sup>r</sup>is there

NOTES.

CHAP. IV. V. 1-3. Solomon returned from his survey of the general condition of mankind, as in many things resembling that of the beasts that perish, to consider the case of the oppressed, who are rendered more wretched than the beasts by the cruelty of their oppressors. He had, doubtless, often had occasion to behold and redress the oppressions committed in his own kingdom, by the rich and powerful on the poor servant and labourer, on the widow and the orphan. This led him to reflect on those who were crushed by more potent tyrants, and who were destitute of any comfort or helper; as none would dare to appear for them, lest they should share their injuries from that power which was employed to commit and maintain injustice. This view of human misery made him ready to conclude that it was better to die than to live in such a wretched world; nay, that it would have been better never to have been born, to witness and experience the afflictions which arise from man's wickedness all over the earth. And so doubtless it would, if it were not for the comforts of religion, and the hope of a better world; which the preacher all along meant to except from his general charge of vanity.

V. 4-6. Turning his thoughts another way, Solomon next considered the labour and pains which men take in useful undertakings, and in rendering important services to mankind. Thus they often become renowned, eminent, and prosperous: but then this excites envy and opposition, the effects of which more than counterbalance all the temporal advantages of their right work. (Note, Prov. xxvii. 4.) Others, seeing the vexation which they meet with in an active course, foolishly expect to find more satisfaction in sloth and inactivity. Thus their strength and faculties lie dormant, and they often reduce themselves to pining distress; and yet some of them will assume an air of wisdom, and urge, that, "Better is an handful with quietness, than both hands full with travail and vexation of spirit;" which, though true of him who prefers quietness in doing his duty with a narrower income to greater abundance with contention, yet applies not to the case of the sluggard. His quietness is a mortal disease both of body and soul; his handful is wretched and wilful poverty: and any honest labour, or cumbersome plenty, is better than his quietness and starving.—Pride, ambition, emulation, envy, and hatred, reign so uncontrollably among all orders and ranks, all trades and professions; that when a man has taken a deal of honest pains in some useful work, and brought it to perfection, instead of gaining credit by it, his neighbours look awry at him; nay, he is disparaged and traduced by those who cannot, or will not, imitate (but only carp at) his ingenious labours.—"Some are so absurdly foolish, as to sit down in perfect idleness.—A wise resolution this, to do nothing because others do ill!" (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 7, 8. Solomon next considered the case of one that went into the opposite extreme. A single man, without any associate, for fear of the expenses of a family; one who not only has no children, but is without any near relation; and who yet toils and labours incessantly all his days; who is full of care about scraping together and hoarding riches; who grows griping and penurious as he becomes wealthy and old; who lives in the meanest manner, and yet grudges himself every morsel, bereaving his soul of good; and who has not sense to ask himself for whom he thus labours and starves? to whom it does not occur to inquire, 'Whose slave am I, seeing I work and fare so hard? and who is to reap the fruit of all my toil and penuriousness?' The distant relations, or strangers, which inherit such a man's wealth, never thank him for it; for they know that he would not leave it to them, if he could keep it any longer.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1-8. Wherever we turn our eyes, or our thoughts, we see melancholy proofs of the wickedness and misery of mankind; who, as if the evils of life and death were insufficient, seem to employ all their ingenuity and industry, in creating trouble to themselves and each other! So that every where under the sun, (except as good government allays the evil,) the earth is full of the oppressions of the powerful, and the groans and tears of the oppressed, who often are without redress or comfort: for so selfish are men, that when not directly concerned in oppression, they are more disposed to pay court to the affluent oppressor, than to compassionate or alleviate the miseries of the unhappy sufferers. In this view there is little reason to desire the continuance of life: and if this were all, we might be ready to congratulate those, who had done with its few pleasures and many pains; and even to conclude it best, never to have entered into such a wicked wretched world. And when we take into the account the future state of righteous retribution, we may well say of ungodly men, that it had been better for them, had they never been born. But we should never forget, that all these miseries are the effects of God's displeasure for the iniquities of men, and of their injurious conduct to each other: so that we have no reason to murmur, though we may well despair of happiness in such an afflicted scene.—Nay, even they, who do works eminently right and good, will reap vanity and vexation from them, in proportion as they expect a reward from men: for, the pride and malignity of the human heart will single them out as the objects of bittered envy; and calumny, ingratitude, and opposition will as certainly pursue eminent characters, as the shadow the substance. Yet none, but the fool, will fold his hands in indolence, and suffer his abilities to rust away for want of exercising them: for, the effects of sloth, inducing poverty and unpitied distress, are more vexations than any labour and disappointment. But to be diligent in every right work, from a believing regard to God's gracious acceptance and a love to his name; and then modestly to shun ostentation and competition; to be quiet and mind our own business, avoiding contention, and seeking a comfortable provision for ourselves, and to be useful to others, may somewhat alleviate these vexations. In this sense, "better is an handful with quietness, than both hands full with travail and vexation of spirit." Yet the miser's folly is more egregious, than even that of the sluggard. Men commonly devise some plausible pretext for their avarice: they have families to provide for, or poor relations that have expectations from them; or they labour and hoard now, that they may hereafter enjoy ease and plenty. But the disease gathers strength by time and habit; and is capable of such excess, as could never have been credited, if not proved by facts. Men, who have neither child nor brother, infirm through age, and tottering on the brink of the grave, still scrape and toil without measure or cessation! They continually grow more grasping and penurious; they bereave themselves, as well as others, of all enjoyment and comfort; they are the wretched yet the willing slaves of the most cruel of masters, who gives them no rest or respite, till death remove them, and they leave their idol behind them; and their heirs rejoice, and commonly dissipate their treasure! Surely this is also a vanity, yea, it is a sore travail. Let us then beware of covetousness, and guard against its first beginnings, if we would avoid these despicable and destructive extremes.

V. 9-16. We cannot escape, but we may mitigate, the vanity of life, by a prudent use of the comforts of society and endeared connections: this will solace and recompense our labours; we shall have kind friends to sympathize with us in our sorrows, to comfort us when dejected, to animate us in our difficulties, to defend us from injury, or to assist us to repair our losses: and we may render them the same reciprocal services. In all things union gives stability, and tends to success and safety; for a threefold cord cannot easily be broken. But above all, the union of Christians, and the communion thence resulting, produce manifold advantages. Whilst with united hearts, endeavours, and prayers, they are occupied in the work of faith and labour of love, they enjoy a good reward. They assist each other, when they fall into any sin, temptation, or trouble, by encouragement or friendly reproof: but "woe to him, that is alone, when he falleth; for he hath not another to help him up." They warm each other's hearts, whilst they converse together of the joys of heaven, or the love of Christ, or unite in singing his praises; but a solitary Christian will scarcely be very lively, or fervent in spirit. And no enemy can withstand the combined efforts and fervent prayers of associated Christians: nor can Satan prevail against them, except by dividing them. Let brotherly love then continue, and diffuse its divine influence through all the church of Christ: and let us endeavour to improve our opportunities of Christian fellowship, and to turn them to good account. In these things all is not vanity: though there will be imperfection and alloy, as long as we are under the sun. The poorest Christian however, may find a more solid satisfaction, in communion with God, and the hope of heaven, and in his proper work and the society of his brethren, than any ungodly prince can find upon his throne: nay, the most ignorant and inexperienced believer is wiser and happier, than those, who are old and great, but will not take good counsel. For rank and old age do not always give wisdom, but rather increase pride and obstinacy, which are the most ruinous kinds of folly. And if he, that from a dungeon should, through his wisdom, be advanced to a throne, be preferable to him, who born in his kingdom is reduced to poverty by his folly: how honourable and happy will they be, who by faith in the Son of God, are advanced from the bondage of sin and Satan, to the glorious kingdom that cannot be moved. And how miserable and contemptible they, however rich and great, who have their good things here; and then for their sins are condemned to everlasting punishment in hell! Indeed, the most politic and successful princes find little comfort in their dignity and reputation. The inconstancy of the people, who soon forget their services; the domestic disquietudes, to which they are far more exposed than their inferiors; and the parties and rivalship, which are thus excited and fomented, commonly fill their closing scene with vexation and bitterness, as every reflecting reader of history must have often remarked. This has been the case in every age: and men must lay their account with it, however at first they may be caressed and extolled: and "surely this also is vanity, and vexation of spirit." But the willing subjects of Jesus, our King, from age to age rejoice in him alone, and they will love him more and more to all eternity. May all the living that walk under the sun hear of him, trust in him, and obey him, henceforth to the end of the world. In this alone there is no vanity and vexation.

NOTES.

CHAP. V. V. 1-3. Solomon meant by his whole argument, to shew, that every thing was vanity except true religion: but here he cautions his readers against those mistakes, which render even religious duties vain and worthless.—Religion is the only remedy indeed, the only comfort we have against all the troubles to which we are subject in this world: but such is the vanity of mankind, they spoil their very remedy, and take away all the virtue of that which should be their support, turning it into a mere ceremony, whilst their minds remain impure, and without any true sense of God.' (Bp. Patrick.)—Every one indeed ought to attend the house and ordinances of God: but it should be done with holy awe and reverence, shewn by the customary external expressions: as Moses was commanded to uncover his feet, when on holy ground. The first care of all, who would acceptably worship God, should be to hear, and learn how he should be worshipped; that they may not, in a precipitate manner, affront him with a hypocritical or superstitious service, or with sacrifices, oblations, or ceremonies, without a correspondent frame of mind. These are "the sacrifices of fools;" who, through ignorance and carelessness, do evil and are not aware of it, but suppose they recommend themselves to God, when in fact they greatly provoke him. Men should therefore avoid rashness in their professions, petitions, or vows; they should not hastily speak before God every thing which occurs to their thoughts.—They should remember his greatness and purity who dwelleth in heaven, that high and holy place, and their own indigence and sinfulness: They ought to avoid needless loquacity and vain repetitions; and express themselves in plain language and with perspicuous brevity, such as springs from the heart, and not such as is affected and studied. All kinds of copious prayers cannot be condemned, but only those that are unmeaning; such as the vain repetitions of the heathen, who expected to be heard for their much speaking; (1 Kings xviii. 26-29;) the pater-nosters, and other forms used by the Papists, and the long prayers of the Pharisees. These verbose supplications shew certain traces of a man's ignorance and folly, and that he has confused, false, and dishonourable thoughts of God and religion; even as the incoherencies of a dream often shew the multitude of cares and employments which occupy our waking hours. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 4-7. Great caution is requisite to avoid sin and vexation in religious vows. In general, a man, should pay his vows, if lawful, however inconvenient it may be, and that without delay; for the contrary is extremely foolish and displeasing to God, who is mocked and trifled with; and it is much better to avoid all vows, than thus to infringe them. If a man had vowed any thing rashly, his mouth had given occasion to his flesh, or his corrupt nature, to commit sin; and he would have to plead, either before "the great Angel of the Covenant," (whom some think to be meant;) or before the priests, the messengers of God, or those angels which witness our conduct, that his vow was an imprudence or a mistake. This would provoke the Lord to frown upon him, and prevent the success of his undertakings: and why should a man expose himself to such severe rebukes, by needlessly vowing, or by distrustfully refusing to pay his vows? Men should therefore be watchful over their tongues: for as divers vanities are found in the multitude of dreams; so assuredly will much sin and folly intermingle with the words of him, who speaks a great deal, and without due deliberation and reflection. But the proper remedy of 9 Moreover, the profit of the earth is for all: the king himself is served by the field.

10 He that loveth silver shall not be satisfied with silver; nor he that loveth abundance with increase: this is also vanity.

11 When goods increase, they are increased that eat them: and what good is there to the owners thereof, saving the beholding of them with their eyes?

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—7. It is no wonder that our outward possessions and enjoyments should be so vain and vexatious; when our depraved hearts so generally render our religious worship useless to ourselves, and dishonourable to God. And if this only source of solid comfort be perverted to vanity, how great must be that vanity! yet, alas! not only mere hypocrites or ostentatious Pharisees provoke God by their vain shew of piety; but we have all cause to be humbled and ashamed on this account. How do our wandering imaginations, our want of reverence, faith, love, gratitude, and spirituality, and the incursions of pride and vanity, render our attendance on divine ordinances little better than a mere lip-labour, or the sacrifice of fools! This should teach us to prepare for the service of God, and to go with cheerful, yet with solemn steps, into his more immediate presence; to be of a teachable spirit, and studious so to learn his will, that we may not inconsiderately do evil in his sacred worship; to recollect who and where we speak; that the filial boldness, with which we come to his throne of grace, may not degenerate into an irreverent familiarity. We should also remember, that we do not confess our sins, or our obligations, or make known our requests before the Lord, for his information; but in order to bring our minds in a humble dependent frame, and to render him that honour which belongs unto him. We should therefore watch against rashness and presumption: we should think, before we speak to the Lord, that our words may correspond to our desires, and accord with his promises: we should be very watchful against ostentation in public services, as if, by copiousness and eloquence of words we meant to attract the attention or admiration of men, or thought we should prevail with God. No unmeaning repetitions, that were ever used in formal worship, can be more offensive to God, than such pompous declamations, even in the use of extempore prayer: the confusion of a dream is not more impertinent, the vain babbling of a fool is not more disgusting to judicious and pious minds, than such an affected multiplicity of words in religious worship. A few broken sentences from a humble heart, spoken in reverence, and with pious affections, whilst the speaker is ashamed of his own poor performance, are more honourable and acceptable to God, than those affected services which are often greatly admired by men, but in reality are a compound of arrogance, ignorance, and hypocrisy. Our words should then be few, except as the heart is fraught with large and manifold desires, which struggle for utterance, and which no words can fully express. We have also great cause to guard against rashness in religious vows; and, in those things which are not previously our bounden duty, we should never vow without consideration, counsel, and prayer: we should be satisfied that the thing engaged for be lawful, in our own power, no injury to others, and fit for us to perform, however circumstances may vary: otherwise we shall be tempted to delays and evasions, which will manifest our own folly, and provoke the Lord to anger; we shall fall into temptations and snares; and when we should be performing our vows, we shall be seeking excuses, before God or man, or in our own consciences, why we should violate them. But, however this may escape human observation; the Lord will not be trifled with; and manifold disappointments and losses in every undertaking may at length make us sensible, that it would have been better for us to have paid what we had vowed. Let us then remember, that we must give an account of every unprofitable word at the day of judgment; and, that when we give an unbounded license to our tongues, we might as well expect a multitude of dreams without any incoherency, as that our discourse should be without wickedness and mischief: and especially let us seek to have our hearts possessed with the fear of God, and delivered from the fear of man or desire of his applause.

V. 8—20. In this present world we must expect to behold, and perhaps to suffer the oppression of the wicked, and their violence and perversion of law and equity. But the Lord will carry his people through their troubles, and execute vengeance on their adversaries. "For He that is higher than the highest regardeth, and there be higher than they." Let us then pity and help the

The vanity of riches, without power to enjoy them; and of large families and long life, 1-5. The little advantage that a wise man has above a fool, or one man above another, 7, 8. The vanity of restless desires; the frailty of man; and the emptiness and uncertainty of all his enjoyments, 9-12.

THERE is <sup>a</sup>an evil which I have seen under the sun, and it is common among men:

2 A <sup>b</sup>man to whom God hath given riches, wealth, and honour, <sup>c</sup>so that he wanteth nothing for his soul of all that he desireth; yet God giveth him not power to eat thereof, <sup>d</sup>but a stranger eateth it: this is <sup>e</sup>vanity, and it is an evil disease.

3 If <sup>f</sup>a man beget an hundred children, and live many years, <sup>g</sup>so that the days of his years be many, and his soul be not filled with good, <sup>h</sup>and also that he have no burial; I say, <sup>i</sup>that an untimely birth is better than he.

oppressed, as we have power; but neither envy nor fear successful oppressors: nay, we should pity and pray for them also, as long as there are any hopes of their escaping the damnation of hell. The rich and great, indeed, are apt to think themselves entitled to every thing, and independent of every one; yet they are not only equally dependent on the Lord for daily bread with the poorest beggar, but they are more dependent on the labour of the ploughman, than he is on their wealth. The goodness of Providence is more equally distributed than appears to a superficial observer. The most plentiful productions of the earth are in reality most valuable: the king needs them, and the poor share them; and these relish their mean morsel better than he does his luxuries. Thus far the profit of the field is satisfying, as the proper provision for our bodies: but no riches or abundance can supply the wants, or satisfy the desires of our souls; the attempt must be for ever vain and vexatious; nay, the increase of riches increases cumber and care more than enjoyment; except a man's mind can be filled by his eyes poring upon securities, surveying his acres, or viewing his hoarded gold. And it is evident in fact, that the poor labourer sleeps sweetly without fear or disturbance, whilst the abundance of the rich will not suffer him to sleep. For the more men covet wealth, the greater anxiety must they feel, when they consider its uncertainty. The riches that have been gathered and hoarded by the toil and penury of many years, are often swept away by some unforeseen calamity; or a covetous man, by grasping at some still larger advantage, loses all in some ruinous project; nay, whilst his riches perish by some evil travail, he often loses his life in attempting to preserve them, or breaks his heart for very vexation at his disappointment; or his children spend all, and become as poor as if he had neither laboured nor saved. And whether the rich man do, or do not survive his wealth, a coffin, a shroud, and a grave, all given him at the option of the survivors, will shortly be his whole inventory; and in other respects, as he came, so shall he go, except that he must give an account for all his conduct at the tribunal of God. What a sore evil then is this, for a rational creature to spend his life in incessant toil, care, and uneasiness; and to live in dejection and fretfulness all his life; and then to end his days in sorrow and wrath, as well as with sickness and dying pains! Having therefore food and raiment, let us be therewith content: and let us cheerfully use what God giveth us, as the fruit of our labour, for the ends for which he bestows it. If he pleases that we should be poor, let us be patient and satisfied; we may be safer and happier in that situation than if we were richer: and if God gives a man riches, let him remember to receive them from his hand, and to use them to his glory, and to rejoice in doing the duties of his station. It is a singular mercy, when God giveth a man wealth, and enableth him to use it in a becoming and useful manner, taking his portion with moderation and thankfulness; avoiding avarice and extravagance, and doing good according to his ability. This wisdom cometh from above; they who desire it must ask it of God, and they who have it will praise him for it. And if God answers a man's prayers and expectations in those better things, which are, and ought to be, the joy of his heart; whether he have much or little, he will not make great account of the shortness and vanity, or the pleasures or pains of this life; or perplex himself about the past or the future; seeing his heart and treasure are out of the reach of the changes of this lower world, in a kingdom which can never be moved.

NOTES.

CHAP. VI. V. 1. The former part of this chapter is a continuation of the subject, with which the preceding chapter concludes; namely, the vanity of riches, without a heart or power to make a proper use of them; which was then, and is still, a very common evil under the sun. (Notes v. 13-20.)

V. 2. 'He sheweth that it is the plague of God, when a rich man hath not a liberal heart to use his riches.'—The expressions by which the rich man's prosperity is described, are very emphatical. To those two words riches and wealth, he here adds a third, viz. glory, which is more comprehensive than the other, including all those good things which may do a man credit, and raise him to a splendid condition. 'It denotes any thing that hath weight in it, and makes a man to be valued.' (Gen. xxxi. 1.) 'Yet so great is his ingratitude to God, and his uncharitableness to men, that for these and other sins, God denies him the power to enjoy these gifts of his bounty.' (Bp. Patrick.)—The passage indeed may be explained of sickness and bodily infirmities, by means of which a man is deprived of all comfort from his wealth and dignity, and his attendants and physicians reap more advantage from his estate than he does. Yet it rather darkness, and <sup>k</sup>his name shall be covered with darkness.

7 All <sup>p</sup>the labour of man is for his mouth, and yet the <sup>q</sup>appetite is not filled.

8 For <sup>r</sup>what hath the wise more than the fool? what hath <sup>s</sup>the poor, that knoweth to walk before the living?

9 <sup>t</sup>Better is the sight of the eyes than the <sup>u</sup>wandering of the desire: <sup>v</sup>this is also vanity and vexation of spirit.

seems to refer to the miser's penuriousness, and to the suspicions and distastes which he imbibes respecting his children and relations; through which he attaches himself to strangers, who devour his substance, either during his life or after his death, to the injury of his children and family. This is a diseased state of the mind, and renders a man very miserable.

V. 3-5. The most flourishing family, and the longest life with increasing prosperity, cannot make that man happy, "whose soul is not filled with good." 'If he can never have enough, as we see often that the covetous man falleth into crimes that deserve death, or is murdered, or drowned, or hangeth himself, or such like, and so lacketh the honour of burial.' Nay, if a man have no heart to use his abundance, and thus lives uncomfortably; and if he be treated with disrespect at his death, and not buried decently according to his rank, either through the avarice of his heirs, or their contempt of his character; he may justly be deemed more unhappy and dishonoured than even an untimely birth, which seems indeed to come into the world in vain, and leaves it in obscurity and disgrace, and has no name to be remembered on earth: which hath not seen the sun, or enjoyed any pleasure, or known any thing; yet hath this embryo more rest than the other. It had rest in the womb, and now rests in the grave; its pain was transient, its unhappiness a mere negation of pleasure, and it lived not to contract guilt. Whereas the other had little pleasure in life, and endured much vexation, contracted much guilt, and departed with disgrace to give an account of it at God's tribunal.

V. 6. Should the joyless, vexatious life of such a man be lengthened out to above twice the age of Methuselah, it would only prolong his miseries; and he must go down at last to the dust, like the child that died in the womb.—The grave is exclusively meant, for in the eternal world there are distinct places for the righteous and the wicked; as Solomon evidently believed, or he would not have said, that "the righteous hath hope in his death."

V. 7, 8. Though the labour of man as to this present world is chiefly bestowed about the supply of his bodily wants, and the satisfaction of his animal desires; yet the very appetite for food cannot be durably satisfied, but still craves more and more with each returning day; whilst the relish of it continually grows more languid. In this respect the most learned, ingenious, or sagacious man has no advantage above the very idiot; who by one means or other gets food, and relishes it as well as the other. Nay, the poor man, who knows how to suit himself to his station, and to act prudently whilst he continues among the living, has as much comfort as the richest; and in what then is he under any real disadvantage?—"What hath the poor that knoweth to walk before the living?" Even the same as the rich; namely, a supply of food, &c., to satisfy his natural wants and appetites, which is all that the rich can have, notwithstanding their abundance.

V. 9. The sight of the eye seems to mean present enjoyment; for it is a pleasant thing for the eyes to behold the light. This is preferable to the restless desires, imaginations, and schemes, that engross men's minds, spoil their present comfort, and create them abundance of vexation.—'To be content with that which God hath given, is better than to follow the desires which never can be satisfied.—It is far better for a man to enjoy the present good, which is before his eyes, than to disquiet and rack his thoughts with an insatiable desire of what he hath not, and perhaps cannot have.' (Bp. Hall.)

V. 10. The whole of what man can obtain of wisdom, power, renown, wealth, or prosperity, has already been declared; but the word man, or Adam, implies his condition in his best estate, as taken from and returning to the dust of the earth, and condemned to spend his days and eat his bread in sorrow, and in the sweat of his brow, till that sentence be executed. And it is in vain to contend with that almighty Judge who hath passed this sentence upon him, or to endeavour to get it reversed.—'Although a man grow famous, yet it is known that he is but a man; and he cannot contend with him that is stronger than himself.' (Melancthon.)

V. 11, 12. Seeing the many things which men pursue on earth only form an increase of vanities, what is man the better for all his worldly devices and acquisitions? Who indeed can so much as tell what is good for man, all the days of his vain life, which passeth as a shadow? Or who can inform him of what will hereafter befall him, or of what will take place after his death, or become of his family?—'Those four things, in which men place their happiness, wisdom, pleasure, honour, and wealth, draw so many, and so great inconveniences after them, as sufficiently demonstrate a man is still to seek for the satisfaction of his desires, if he look no further.' (Bp. Patrick.)

11 ¶ Seeing there be many things that increase vanity, what is man the better?

12 For who knoweth what is good for man in this life, all the days of his vain life which he spendeth as a shadow? for who can tell a man what shall be after him under the sun?

The benefit of a good name; of death above life; and of sorrow and rebuke above vain mirth, 1-6. Observations concerning oppression, bribery, pride, anger, and discontent, 7-10. The advantages of wisdom; of accommodating to circumstances, and of avoiding extremes and occasions of offence, 11-22. The dangers to the wisest arising from bad women, with Solomon's experience in that respect, 23-28. Man created upright, but ruined by his own devices, 29.

A GOOD name is better than precious ointment: and the day of death than the day of one's birth.

2 It is better to go to the house of mourning, than to go to the house of feasting: for that is the end of all men; and the living will lay it to his heart.

3 Sorrow is better than laughter: for by the sadness of the countenance the heart is made better.

4 The heart of the wise is in the house of mourning; but the heart of fools is in the house of mirth.

5 It is better to hear the rebuke of the wise, than for a man to hear the song of fools.

6 For as the cracking of thorns under a pot, so is the laughter of the fool: this also is vanity.

7 Surely oppression maketh a wise man mad; and a gift destroyeth the heart.

8 Better is the end of a thing than the beginning thereof: and the patient in spirit is better than the proud in spirit.

9 Be not hasty in thy spirit to be angry: for anger resteth in the bosom of fools.

10 Say not thou, What is the cause that the former days were better than these? for thou dost not enquire wisely concerning this.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

There are not only many and sore evils and miseries under the sun, but they are common among men, as every careful observer of mankind must know. For it is seen often that Providence confers on a man a confluence of earthly possessions, so that he wanteth nothing for outward enjoyment, and hath no desire after more substantial good; and yet the Lord leaves him so to his avarice, or his malignant dispositions, that he has no heart to make a comfortable use of them, and, by one means or other, they all come into the hands of strangers; and this is vanity, and a sore disease. Nay, put the case that any one have a numerous family, and a good constitution, and live in health and affluence to old age; yet, if his soul be not enriched with wisdom and grace, and so he lives unbeloved, and dies unlamented and despised, it were wiser to envy the felicity of a still-born child, than that of such a person, who hath only staid on earth to contract guilt, and experience vexation. Sooner or later, the rich and the poor, the wise and the foolish, must be laid in the grave: and it is of small consequence whether this be in infancy, or after double the years of the oldest man who ever lived; seeing the cares so much overbalance the pleasures of life, except as we live to prepare for heaven, to glorify God, and to do good. For, setting these things aside, how vain are all man's labours, how empty are all his enjoyments! A round of trifling pursuits and unsatisfying gratifications, the pleasure of which is more than counterbalanced by the uneasy cravings of the appetite, which are continually returning! And what in this view can the wise do toward acquiring happiness, above the fool? or the rich, above the poor and industrious? Nay, the poorest man, who knows how to walk before the living God, is far happier here than the most prosperous ungodly man. Yet the pleasure of present enjoyments is far better than the empty reveries of visionary good, on which many feed, as upon the wind, and start out of these waking dreams, and find themselves empty, or rather filled with vexation at their disappointment, and tortured with the gnawing of their exorbitant and roving desires. But, indeed, every endeavour of sinful mortal man to find rest and happiness in earthly things, is a vain struggle against the sentence passed upon him for his rebellion, or rather against the effects of his apostasy. And it is equally vain, and still more impious, to cavil at the justice of the sentence, and to contend with Him that is mightier than he. If the earth, with all its inventions and possessions, be only an accumulated vanity, what is man the better for all his speculations and devices? For where is he that can shew unto man any substantial good, in created things, with which he may solace his mind, whilst he passes as a shadow through this vain life? Every attempt of this kind would be as futile as the pretences of fortune-tellers to inform us of those future events, which God hath kept secret from all living, and should be treated as a presumption of the same nature. But in returning unto God, trusting in his mercy, through Jesus Christ, submitting to his will, and preparing for death by a conscientious obedience to his commands, we may find rest to our souls, and enjoy sweet earnestness of heavenly consolations; and soon shall we glide through this vexatious world, and find ourselves in that happy place, where "is fulness of joy, and pleasures at God's right hand for evermore."

NOTES.

CHAP. VII. V. 1. Solomon now seems to proceed to prescribe the best remedies that can be found against that vanity to which we are subject, by setting down many wise precepts for our direction, support, and comfort, in a troublesome world. And if we examine the following particulars, we shall find them comprehended in this general direction, the change of our minds, thoughts, and opinions.—The doctrines that begin this chapter are quite opposite to the common opinions of the world: That a good name is to be preferred to precious ointment; and the day of one's death before one's birth-day; mourning before feasting; sadness before laughter; rebukes before commendations; the end of a thing before the beginning of it; a patient suffering spirit before a stout haughty mind; wisdom before riches, &c. These, and such like, are the maxims of true wisdom and piety, which must be learnt, in order to the settlement of our minds in peace and tranquillity, notwithstanding the vanity that is in all things. (Bp. Patrick.)—The beatitudes, with which our Lord began his sermon on the mount, are a collection of paradoxes, not wholly dissimilar from those of Solomon, but more complete and comprehensive; on the due

V. 23—28. These practical matters Solomon had proved by wisdom; but he humbly owned that he had greatly failed of his determined purpose of being wise. Many things he found himself incapable of investigating or comprehending; and in his earnest search into the nature and reason of things, and to discover the wickedness of men's ignorance, carelessness, and impiety, and of their vain mirth and mad intemperance, he had found himself betrayed into much folly; especially he had been miserably deluded by unprincipled women, to the unspeakable anguish of his heart. All imaginable stratagems and artifices were employed by them to ensnare men in wickedness, and all efforts to hold them in bondage. (Notes, &c. 1 Kings xi.) Solomon here speaks very contritely of his own misconduct; and doubtless was delivered out of this snare of Satan. Yet he, and he alone, who habitually aimed to please God, could expect to escape this danger, into which the careless sinner would fall, probably to rise

CHAP. VIII.

A commendation of wisdom, 1. The king must be obeyed, from prudence, and for conscience-sake, 2-5. The misery of men for want of foresight, neglect of opportunities, and the unavoidable stroke of death, 6-8. Men abuse power, and the patience of God, to the increase of wickedness and misery, 9-11. The righteous happy, and the wicked miserable: notwithstanding contrary appearances, 12-15. The unsearchableness of God's counsels and works, 16, 17.

2 <sup>I</sup> counsel thee to keep the king's commandment, and that <sup>in</sup> regard of the oath of God.

4 Where <sup>the</sup> word of a king is, <sup>there</sup> is power: and who may say unto him, <sup>What</sup> doest thou?

5 Whoso <sup>keepeth</sup> the commandment shall <sup>feel</sup> no evil thing: and <sup>a</sup> wise man's heart discerneth both time and judgment.

6 ¶ Because <sup>to</sup> every purpose there is time and judgment, <sup>therefore</sup> the misery of man is great upon him.

no more.—Again, Solomon observed, with surprise, that, when he looked over his courtiers and his subjects, one by one, as far as their conduct fell under his inspection, in order to make out the number of truly pious and honest persons among them; he could find a few men of this stamp, at least one of a thousand: but a woman among all those, (that is, among his thousand wives and concubines,) had he not found; not one who was thoroughly chaste, upright, and pious. We are not hence to infer, that Solomon thought there were fewer good women than men: but that he knew, that he had not gone the right way to find the virtuous woman, when he deviated so widely from the original law of marriage; and instead of seeking one rational companion, the sole object of his endeared affections, he had collected a vast multitude for magnificence and indulgence. The more valuable part of the sex would not willingly form one in such a group; and if any of them were previously well-disposed, the jealousies, party-interests, contests, and artifices, which take place in such situations, would tend exceedingly to corrupt them, and render them all nearly of the same character. Solomon therefore here speaks the language of a penitent, warning others against the sins into which he had been betrayed; and not that of a waspish satirist, lashing indiscriminately one half of the human species.

V. 29. The royal preacher sums up the whole of his observations on the state and conduct of man, in this verdict. God indeed created man upright, and very good; but Adam having apostatized from him, his posterity have sought out an immense number of inventions, in order to find happiness in the world, and without God, which have only proved so many variations of impiety and iniquity; so that very few pious persons are to be found any where on earth. A most decisive testimony concerning original sin, and the wretched state of man by nature!

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1-10. That is most valuable which is most useful, and enables a man to do the greatest good; a character therefore for probity and discretion is far more desirable, than worldly possessions or pleasures; nay, than the renown of shining talents and splendid performances. But "a name in the book of life" is the only distinction, which will prove finally advantageous. If this be our felicity, and our experience and conduct evidence it, we may rejoice in the thoughts of death, as a removal from sorrow and fear, and an entrance upon the full enjoyment of all which we have here loved and thirsted after. Others may be weary of the sufferings of life, and be driven out of the world, with a vain hope of terminating their anguish: but the established believer alone is willing to live though in pain; and willing to die, that he may go to be with him "whom his soul loveth." He finds it profitable to frequent the house of mourning, as it keeps him serious and recollected, in the thoughts of his latter end; and he perceives and experiences, that the house of feasting tends to render the mind dissipated, and the conscience either unfeeling or uneasy. Nay, he learns to take more solid pleasure in sympathizing with and comforting the afflicted, than in scenes of festivity and vain mirth. To be frequently the spectators of affliction tends also to abate our pride and love of worldly things, and to endear the eternal salvation of the gospel. Indeed sorrow is more suited than carnal joy to our state in this sinful suffering world: the Redeemer wept; but it is not recorded that he ever laughed, though he rejoiced in spirit. A serious mind is the proper soil for wisdom; consideration is the beginning of repentance and conversion; and that sadness of countenance, which induces consideration, is a suitable medicine to cure the diseases of the heart. By despising these maxims, men detect their own character: for "the heart of the wise is in the house of mourning; but the heart of fools is in the house of mirth." He, who runs from those scenes in which men may both do and get good, and hurries to places where every thing tends to dissipate reflection, and to keep him from thinking of death till it comes, is likely to live and die without wisdom or hope. And though such rebukes, as this of the wise man, sound harsh, and give pain, they are far better than the songs, and music, and empty laughter,

7 For <sup>he</sup> knoweth not that which shall be: for who can tell him <sup>when</sup> it shall be?

8 There is no man that hath power over the spirit, to retain the spirit; neither hath he <sup>power</sup> in the day of death: and there is no <sup>discharge</sup> in that war; neither shall wickedness deliver those that are given to it.

9 All <sup>this</sup> have I seen, and applied my heart unto every work that is done under the sun: <sup>there</sup> is a time wherein one man ruleth over another to his own hurt.

10 And <sup>so</sup> I saw the wicked buried, who had come and gone from <sup>the</sup> place of the holy, and <sup>they</sup> were forgotten in the city where they had so done: <sup>this</sup> is also vanity.

12 Though <sup>a</sup> sinner do evil an hundred times, and his <sup>days</sup> be prolonged, yet <sup>surely</sup> I know that it shall be well with them that fear God, which <sup>fear</sup> before him:

with which so many waste their lives, as if they were sent into the world to play the fool, to die, and perish. For the whole is "like the crackling of thorns under the pot," a mere shadow of joy, which soon expires, and leaves the soul to darkness and despair. This also is very vanity, and yet the world is full of it! To support the expenses of dissipated and licentious pleasures, wicked men oppress those, who are far wiser and better than themselves; and not only injure them in temporal things, but tempt them to many sins, for which they will in some measure be answerable. For many have, by persecution, been driven to renounce the service of God; and even wise and pious men have, for a time, been driven into mad and foolish measures, by the vehemence of temptation to which oppressors exposed them! Considering the sharp trials which may await us, and conscious of our own frailty, we should earnestly pray that the grace of our Lord may be sufficient for us. We should avoid all occasions of sin; such as covetousness, which, among numerous other evils, leads to bribery; and a bribe corrupts the heart, and overpowers the good purposes of those who intend to do justice. Contention also runs a man into innumerable snares, and is far more easily begun than ended; yet the end of it is indeed better than the beginning. But we shall have continual need of patience; that we may wait, in the way of faith and obedience, the event of those trials which now distress us, but may hereafter comfort us, and of every good undertaking, which will surely at first have difficulties to encounter; and that we may with quietness bear the injuries of our fellow-creatures, which is far happier than to be proud in spirit and swift to wrath. For if we be hasty in spirit to be angry, we may next be tempted to harbour revenge; and experience will then surely convince us, that he is very foolish who suffers anger to rest in his heart. We should likewise watch against discontent: the wickedness of the world around us should excite our sorrow, and our endeavours for personal and public reformation; but we must be careful not to reflect on Providence, or to undervalue our mercies, as if our lot were cast in the most unhappy times. For such complaints originate from ignorance, inconsideration, pride, and impatience. All times and places hitherto have abounded in sin and in trouble: we should therefore seek our rest in God, and he will enable us to live comfortably in any times.

V. 11-22. Without true wisdom, the largest estate will little profit the owner, even for the short space that he will see the sun in the land of the living; but with it his riches may be useful to himself and others; and if the wise man have no estate on earth, he has that which is unspeakably better; he has the excellency of the knowledge of Jesus Christ, which will secure him from all evil, and bring him to endless felicity. We ought also to consider the work of God, even in those things which come on us through men's wickedness, that we may submit to his wise and righteous appointments, which cannot be altered, and could not be mended. We should expect and prepare for changes; the day of prosperity, whilst it enables us to rejoice, calls upon us to exercise gratitude, and do good; the day of adversity calls us to consideration, repentance, and prayer; and the interchanges of joy and sorrow continually instruct us, that God himself is the only unchangeable good of his people, and that all else is vanity and uncertainty. Even piety will not exempt us from calamities here: we should therefore count our cost; for in our days of vanity here below, the righteous often suffers for his righteousness, and the wicked prospers by his wickedness; if, however, we suffer according to the will of God, we are and shall be happy; but we should be careful not to provoke opposition, by unscriptural rigidity, by fiery zeal, by severe censures, or dogmatical decisions concerning those who differ from us; and we may leave it to the followers of Antichrist, to be zealous for uncommanded austerities and observances. They, who are thus righteous over much, and provoke opposition, do not suffer for righteousness' sake, but "destroy themselves." Let us then be zealous and diligent in the substantial parts of true religion, on which the Scriptures principally insist; and then we shall be in no danger of exceeding; and when we hear men, with profane solemnity, cautioning others against being too bold and to the work of the righteous: I said, that this also is vanity.

15 Then <sup>m</sup>I commended mirth, because a man hath no better thing under the sun, than to eat, and to drink, and to be merry: for that shall abide with him of his labour the days of his life, which God giveth him under the sun.

16 When <sup>n</sup>I applied mine heart to know wisdom, active in the service of God; let us caution them, not to bring themselves into swift destruction by their presumptuous crimes. Alas, how many die before their time, by the hand of the executioner, and by loathsome diseases, through their own over much wickedness! The path of truth and duty, however, commonly lies in the middle, at a distance from extremes: and it is good to take hold of both these cautions: but if we truly fear God, he will conduct us safely on this perilous way, and bring us forth from every snare, and the power of every enemy. The wisdom that he giveth is the strength and support of the soul, as it leads the possessors to make "his name their strong tower;" and though we are such poor polluted sinners, and "there is not a just man on earth, that doeth good, and sinneth not;" yet our God will mercifully accept and preserve those, who trust in him, and desire to do his will. If then he so bear with us, we ought to bear with each other; but they that take fire at every affront, will be always quarrelling and sinning: and the modern point of honour, tenaciously observed, would be the rule of being always mischievous and always miserable. He that hath most self-knowledge and is most watchful over his own heart, in different circumstances, will make most allowance for others; being conscious that he needs it from them. In proportion as men are careful to approve themselves to God, they will be less anxious to obtain man's approbation; and they, who are very desirous of knowing what others say of them, perhaps expecting to hear their own commendations, will generally be disappointed, and hear such things from every quarter, as are vexatious and mortifying: for few think so favourably of others as they do of themselves.

V. 23-29. Various important lessons may be learned in wisdom's school, and will be confirmed by experience; but when we resolve, and even bestow pains to be wise, we shall often find it far from us. Many things are too deep for us to fathom, and too distant for us to explore. And whilst we apply our hearts to search out wisdom, and the reason of things; our principal study, as sinners, relates to the nature, evil, foolishness, and madness of sin, with its causes, effects, and remedies. But, alas, they who should teach wisdom to others, are often themselves led to act very foolishly, and by nothing more than by bad women. Happy is he whom God preserves from this most fatal snare, and all its bitter effects. Would we be so happy; let us seek to walk before God and in his sight, trusting in his grace, and observing all his precepts; for many are left to fall into dreadful evils, to punish them for their pride, hypocrisy, or wickedness in other respects. If any such captives of Satan have been delivered by a miracle of mercy, they have more abundant cause for gratitude and watchfulness; and they should be doubly earnest to warn others of their danger.—Many a godly man can with thankfulness acknowledge, that he hath found one prudent and virtuous woman in the wife of his bosom, and aver that he desires no more: but they who have gone as far as they could in Solomon's track, have seldom found one such in all the multitude. This militates against polygamy, as well as every other species of licentiousness; and it is a general rule, that they, who declaim most severely against women, have their chief acquaintance with the most worthless of the sex. In short, the law of God is the rule of our happiness; and the world is miserable, principally because this rule is so universally disregarded and violated. It is most lamentable that so few, either men or women, can be found, who are really the upright servants of God; and that man, whom God made upright, hath found out so many inventions to render himself wicked and miserable. But let us bless God for Jesus Christ, and seek for his special grace, that we may be numbered with his chosen remnant in glory everlasting.

NOTES.

CHAP. VIII. V. 1. Solomon had shewn that wisdom is hard to be acquired; that the wisest are in many things mistaken; and that even wisdom is often attended with vexation; yet he here enquires, who is worthy to be compared with the wise man; the man who knows how to interpret the word of God, and to explain the nature and uses of surrounding objects; and to avail himself of his acquaintance with men and things, that he may be able properly to direct his conduct as circumstances may require? He observes, that wisdom confers a peculiar dignity and comeliness on the possessor, and gives him an ascendancy over the minds of men; yea, the boldness of his countenance is doubled, by the consciousness that he understands the subject, or the work, in which he is engaged. Some interpret the last clause to mean, that by wisdom, the severity and overbearing confidence of a man's looks are changed into mildness and modesty. 'The more we know, the more humble we ought to be; and by the cheerfulness and pleasantness of our countenance to invite others to us, and not by our frowning forbid them, or make them afraid to approach us.' (Bp. Patrick.)—'Whereas before he was proud and arrogant, he shall become (by wisdom) humble and meek.'

V. 2. It hath always been common for subjects, when required, to confirm their engagements of loyalty and submission to the king, with a solemn oath; which should be conscientiously observed. But some think that the words may relate to the limits of a man's obedience: he must obey the king as far as he can consistently with performing his vows and duties to the King of kings. 'Take heed to the mouth of the king, and to the word of the oath of God.' (Old Trans.)

V. 3-5. The royal and sacred teacher here counsels his readers, not to leave the presence of the king under the impulse of anger and passion; or hastily to withdraw from his service; or obstinately to persist in or justify any criminal practices; for a king who has absolute power, needs only give the word, and his mandates and menaces would at once be executed; and none would be able or indeed authorized to call him to an account, or to 'say to him, what doest thou?' A quiet obedience in all things lawful would best insure exemption from punishment; and the self-knowledge and experience of a wise man would enable him to discern the proper times and opportunities of remedying abuses, obtaining redress of grievances, and carrying any useful point, by judicious, lenient, and submissive measures; which could not be done by force and violent means, against a superior power.

V. 6, 7. To accomplish any good design, times must be observed and judgment exercised. But as men, through ignorance or negligence, commonly let opportunities slip, and attempt things unseasonably and injudiciously; they involve themselves in manifold troubles, which might have been avoided; and when the eternal world is taken into the account, it may be said that this is the chief cause of the final misery of mankind. Many things relating to the future cannot be foreknown: nor can one discover them to us; and about those, in which foresight might be of use, men in general are heedless and inattentive. Thus all things seem involved in uncertainty, and no suitable preparation is made for those events which are coming upon them.

V. 8. The preceding observations are peculiarly applicable to death and its consequences. No foresight can discern the time of a man's departure; men know, however, that they must die, and yet they seldom prepare for that important season! No man hath power over the spirit, to retain the spirit, or rational soul, when God commands it to quit the body; no authority or bodily strength can stand any man in stead at that hour; no one can decline the conflict with that tremendous enemy, or find any weapon with which he may successfully resist him; and the wickedness, by which men set God at defiance, will not by any means defend them from the power of this, his messenger and executioner.—This is the more common and obvious interpretation, yet some understand the verse in another sense: 'as good advice to princes, not to abuse their power; but remember, first, that he hath no dominion over men's spirits. Next, he cannot command them long; for death will irresistibly seize on him, as well as on the meanest man. Nay, he cannot rule the chances of war; and neither his policy nor his power shall be able to defend him from the vengeance, that will be taken of the injustice, cruelty, and impiety which he exercises in his government.' (Bp. Patrick.) This is, indeed, one way of applying the text; but the preceding interpretation appears to me more exact and comprehensive.

V. 9, 10. To abate the ambition of some for power, and the envy of others at their success, the wise man here observes; that, in the course of his careful and accurate observations, he had remarked instances, in which one man had exercised absolute authority over others, not only to their hurt, but especially to his own. So that, while he was proceeding in his course of successful tyranny, he came to an untimely end, and all his pomp and magnificence ended in a premature burial, after which he was soon forgotten, or remembered with contempt and abhorrence.—'The place of the holy,' may mean the courts of justice, to which the wicked ruler came, and from which he returned with great state, and surrounded with admiring multitudes, while he professed to administer justice as the viceroy of the holy God. But some interpret the clause of the sanctuary, that holy place, where sacrifices were offered to God, and where the wicked ruler cloaked his oppression with the appearance of piety.—Some understand the latter verse to mean, that wicked rulers often died in peace, and had a splendid funeral; that their wickedness was soon forgotten, even in the place where it had been committed; and that it was indeed a vanity, that an oppressor and tyrant should fare as well as a just and clement prince.

V. 11-13. The denunciations of divine wrath against sinners not being in general executed immediately when the crime is committed, they who perhaps trembled at first when they committed perjury, robbery, murder, or other crimes, finding no harm come upon them, conclude that they shall escape with impunity, and so grow daring in their iniquity. The wickedness of men abuses the long suffering of God into an occasion of more desperate crimes, and their hearts are wholly bent to commit evil of every kind. Whereas, if God should cut off every criminal by some tremendous judgment, as soon as ever he had violated his commandments, men would be afraid to run into such excesses as they now do without fear or shame. But though the ungodly should perpetrate multiplied and aggravated crimes, and their lives should be continued in outward prosperity; yet Solomon assuredly knew that it would be well with those who feared God, and walked before him in his ordinances and commandments, from a reverential awe of his authority, justice, and heart-searching presence; but that it could not be well with the wicked, for they must needs be disquieted with their own passions, and rendered uneasy by remorse and terror; and their most durable prosperity would flee away like a shadow, and expire as a short reprieve: and then just vengeance would come upon them for their contempt of God.

V. 14, 15. In the course of human affairs, upright godly men are often involved in those troubles, which are the general effect of vice; being visited with pain, disease, or poverty, or despised, reviled, and hated; and wicked men prosper and are caressed, as if they were the peculiar favourites of God and man. This observation caused Solomon again to recommend a moderate use of worldly things with a cheerful and contented mind: this he regarded as the greatest advantage which can be made of all below the sun. Amidst all changes, such a frame of mind, if the result of right principles, might be preserved, and be the recompense and solace of all his labours in this evil world.

and to see the business that is done upon the earth ; (for also there is that neither day nor night seeth sleep with his eyes :)

17 Then I beheld all the work of God, that a man cannot find out the work that is done under the sun ; because though a man labour to seek it out, yet he shall not find it : yea, farther ; though a wise man think to know it, yet shall he not be able to find it.

Like things happen to good and bad men till death. 1-3. The near approach of death should induce men to use cheerfully the comforts, and perform diligently the duties of life. 4-10. 4 For to him that is joined to all the living there is hope : for a living dog is better than a dead lion.

Some, indeed, think that Solomon records this as the corrupt inference which he drew from the afflictions of the righteous, and the prosperity of the wicked, whilst he was a wanderer from God and his service. 'If this be the case,' says he, 'let us indulge ourselves; let us eat, drink, and be merry; for wisdom and righteousness have little advantage of folly and madness; and the pleasure that a man hath enjoyed, is the only thing of which he may not be robbed.'

V. 16. 17. Solomon here records the result of his perplexing researches into the affairs of men, and the purposes and works of God. Examining with great attention into the affairs of mankind, he found that many of them scarcely allowed themselves rest or sleep, day or night; and yet their anxiety seemed very unprofitable and vain! And when he inquired with similar diligence into the works of God, he found that he could not comprehend or explain them all. He was persuaded that no application or capacity would enable a man to fathom the depths of the Divine dispensations in the government of this lower world. Some think that Solomon meant himself, as an anxious inquirer into these subjects, when he mentioned him who "neither day nor night saw sleep with his eyes," because he was restless and unwearied in his fruitless investigation.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1-8. None of the rich, the powerful, the honourable, or the accomplished of the sons of men are equally excellent, useful, or happy, with the wise man. For who else can interpret the words of God, or deduce the proper instructions from his truths and dispensations? Wisdom confers the most permanent amiableness, and engages the most durable esteem; it softens the manners of the severe, and it gives boldness to the timid in the path of duty. May we choose and seek this wisdom, whatever we lose or come short of; and with all our getting, get 'a good understanding in the way of godliness!' The wise man will obey the king and those in authority, and he will charge others to do the same; he will be conscientious in his subjection, as a part of his obedience to God; and not trifle with oaths or solemn engagements. Common prudence, indeed, will teach a man to avoid unequal contests with those who are too powerful for him; and to shun exasperating language concerning such as give no account of their conduct. But the wise man will be submissive from higher principles: out of regard to the honour of God and the credit of his profession, he will repress all railing and indecent censures of such as administer public affairs; he will engage in no virulent opposition or hasty measures; he will continue in his place and station; he will not enter upon, much less persist in, any turbulent attempts; nor needlessly expose himself to the anger of the ruler. But if this be wisdom, and the reverse folly, what madness must it be for us weak and dependent creatures to persist in rebellion against the Almighty, who doeth what he pleaseth, who speaketh with power, and giveth no account of his matters! Here especially unreserved subjection is our only wisdom: he that keepeth his commandment, to repent, and to bring forth fruits meet for repentance, shall feel no evil thing; the wise man's heart will discern that now is the time to seek pardon and peace, and to prepare for the day of final retribution. But, alas, what numbers slip this opportunity; form an erroneous judgment of things present and future, and bring misery upon themselves both in this life and that which is to come! As they cannot foresee, and none can certainly inform them of, future events, they think themselves justified in utterly neglecting the preparation for death and judgment; and so these overtake them unawares, and sink them into irreversible misery. "Oh that men were wise, that they understood these things, that they would consider their latter end!" For death will come shortly, and perhaps suddenly; and no power, prosperity, courage, or prudence, can avail a man in that day, when God shall require his soul. The believer alone is prepared to meet the solemn summons without dismay; to him the king of terrors will appear disarmed of his sting, and his grim countenance be softened into a smile: when he placidly yields to the stroke of death, he resigns his soul into his Redeemer's hands, and confidently expects the period, when that conqueror of fallen man shall be swallowed up in victory. But with what horror will the wicked discover, that neither their daring presumption, nor their artful schemes of villany, can retard the approach of this dreadful foe! Nay, frequently their crimes accelerate, as well as add anguish to, this distressing season; and thus "the wicked is driven away in his wickedness, but the righteous hath hope in his death." If this is the end of all men, as to this present scene, and an eternity of happiness or misery is to succeed; our grand concern is to know, that "when our earthly tabernacle shall be dissolved, we have an house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens."

V. 9-17. Careful observers of mankind will find, that those abuses of power which injure others, are still more hurtful to the tyrant himself; and if, after a vexatious and mischievous life, a man must be put off with a grave for his body and infamy on his character, all must needs be vanity. Nay, should any man live in ungodly prosperity to extreme old age, and then die in outward peace, and have his crimes concealed or varnished over by a pompous funeral, a panegyric oration, a splendid monument, and a lying inscription, all would still be vanity. Wicked men may indeed misconstrue and abuse the long-suffering of God, "because sentence against an evil work is not executed speedily;" and they may be emboldened in iniquity by impunity; but they will find that in his own season, and according to his own infinite wisdom and justice, he will certainly execute on them his most tremendous threatenings. And faith will assure us, that it will certainly be well in time, and to eternity, with the conscientious worshipper and servant of God; and that they must be miserable, who have no fear of him before their eyes. Let us then pray for an increase of faith; that we may view eternal things as near, real, and infinitely important. This alone can establish the heart in this mixed scene, in which the righteous often suffer, and the wicked prosper. But instead of saying with the epicure, "let us eat, drink, and be merry, for to-morrow we die;" or, on the other hand, murmuring against the appointments of God, and indulging vain objections; let us seek for a lively hope, a submissive will, and a contented mind; then, leaving the Lord to clear up all difficulties in his own time, we may cheerfully enjoy the comforts, and bear up under the trials of life, for the few days which we are to pass "under the sun;" whilst peace of conscience, and joy in the Holy Ghost, will abide within us, through all outward changes, and even when flesh and heart shall fail. And trusting in the mercy and truth of God in Christ, we should give him credit for his wisdom, justice, and goodness, where we cannot discern them. Thus we shall escape the perplexity and presumption which must unite with all attempts to unravel the intricacies of his providential government. For the most acute and penetrating minds, using the most unwearied diligence, must fail of comprehending all his works and ways. Secret things belong to him, and only revealed things to us. Our studies therefore, to be wise above what is written, must involve us in sin and perplexity, and can never lead to any satisfactory conclusions. But to believe and obey here, will be a preparation for that world hereafter, where "we shall know, even as also we are known."

NOTES.

CHAP. IX. V. 1-3. Though Solomon could not find out the whole work of God; yet his enquiries led him to many useful conclusions, which he declared for the benefit of others. For he was assured, that the righteous and the wise, and their works, were under the special care of God; and that they would be favoured with that measure of success and usefulness which he saw best. Yet the events of human life were so intricately and mysteriously arranged, that no man could decide concerning himself, or another, whether he were the object of God's special love, or under his wrath, by any outward occurrences.—The Lord in his manifold wisdom sometimes afflicts, and sometimes prospers, both the righteous and the wicked, without any exact discrimination; no kind, degree, or continuance of outward affliction can be mentioned, from which a godly man is certainly exempted; or of worldly prosperity, but wicked men have enjoyed it. And yet prosperity is by no means the uniform lot of the wicked, or adversity of the righteous. But matters are so varied and blended together, that all things may be said to come alike to all; and one event to befall the most unjust, selfish, sensual, and impious; and the most upright, kind, pure, and pious, who walk in the ordinances, and reverence the holy name, of God, as well as act honestly and blamelessly among men. The difference betwixt them, as to present happiness, arises not from outward causes, but from the inward supports and consolations which the righteous enjoy, and the benefit they derive from these varied trials and mercies; and the inward remorse and terror that wicked men experience, and their growing more daring in impiety under all they meet with. For as this state of things appears grievous, and often proves a temptation to the righteous, it exceedingly forwards the destruction of the wicked. As far as the sons of men are left to themselves, their hearts are full of evil; and prosperity in sin causes their lusts to rage even to madness: thus they are led to set God himself at defiance by their impieties and daring crimes; and they proceed in this course, till death closes their career, their hope expires with their breath, and they join the company of those that before have perished in their sins.

V. 4-6. Whilst life continues, an afflicted man may expect better days, and the conversion of the vilest sinner may be hoped for. In this view life is very valuable; and the proverb is applicable, that "a living dog is better than a dead lion." The condition of the meanest or most despicable living man is preferable to that of the most noble and renowned of those who have died impenitent. For the living, being sure that they must die, may perhaps

9 <sup>Live</sup> joyfully <sup>with</sup> the wife whom thou lovest <sup>all</sup> the days of the life of thy vanity, which he hath given thee under the sun, all the days of thy vanity: <sup>for</sup> that is thy portion in <sup>this</sup> life, and in thy labour which thou takest under the sun.

prepare for that solemn event: but the dead have no further knowledge of any thing here on earth; they have no further recompense of their worldly labours: they are soon forgotten; and the love, hatred, or envy, which they bare to others, and others to them, with all their pleasant or painful effects, are done with for ever, as far as this world is concerned: and, however rich and great they were, "they have no longer a portion for ever, in any thing, that is done under the sun." Of this Solomon doubtless is to be understood: his scope is to shew the vanity of earthly things, and the madness and folly of a wicked life, of which all the benefits must speedily be relinquished for ever. Nor would either the righteous be perplexed at the transient afflictions they meet with, or the wicked hardened by their fading prosperity; if they recollected how soon all this will end, and that a state of eternal retribution will succeed. (Note, viii. 11—13.)

V. 7—9. Solomon, having spoken to the case of the wicked, here returns to the wise and religious, whom he had before mentioned (1 :) and he exhorts them to a cheerful confidence in God, who will be sure to do well to those whose works are accepted of him. They should therefore seek to possess a peaceful conscience, a lively hope, and a contented mind: and in this case they might enjoy, with comfort and gratitude, the bounty of Providence, whether they be rich or poor. They needed not go as mourners all their days; but might be clothed in white garments, and use fragrant ointments, as was customary on festive occasions; for they alone had cause for gladness of heart. They were not required to refrain from a liberal use of their possessions, (so it were with temperance and charity;) either out of penuriousness, or distrust, or from a superstitious notion that religion consisted in a painful austerity. Let them use the comforts, and bear the burdens of the day, and not be solicitous about the morrow.—It would also lessen the uneasiness of life, to have a companion of its comforts, and a solace of its sorrows, in a beloved wife. Though Solomon himself had so multiplied wives; yet he here uses the singular number, and says "the wife whom thou lovest;" as one sensible of his folly in that matter; (Prov. v. 15—20.) He recommends it to a man to live with this one beloved wife with cheerfulness, making the best of present things, avoiding impatience and gloomy despondency, as dishonourable to God, and tormenting to himself. A few days of life are given to man on earth; and sin has made them vanity. But he may yet find many comforts, as his present portion, and the recompense of his labours: and it would be both foolish and ungrateful to lose the benefit of them, by fretting over his crosses, or anticipating future calamities.

V. 10. Man's wisdom in this dying world consists, in cheerfully using present comforts, and diligently attending to present duties. Whatever any one is convinced ought to be done by him, for the benefit of himself, his family, the church, or the world; according to his rank, station, talents, and opportunities; he ought to set about it without delay, and to pursue it without remissness, and to the utmost of his abilities: he ought not to yield to weariness or discouragement, because of opposition, difficulties, or hardships: and he should redeem his time for such purposes, remembering that he is hastening to the grave; and then all opportunities of this kind will be over, seeing there is no work, nor contrivance, nor knowledge, nor wisdom there. And even in the eternal world there will be no opportunity of glorifying God by doing good to man, as there is now on earth.—The original is sheol, the Septuagint hades, which may as well be understood of the invisible world as of the grave.

V. 11, 12. The wise man next observed another cause of vanity in worldly things. Men's success seldom corresponds to their probable expectations of it. The swiftest do not always win the race; for they may fall, or be impeded in their course: battles are not determined, according to the number, valour, or conduct of the contending parties: knowledge and prudence are so far from ensuring riches to the possessor, that they often fail of procuring him a race is not to the swift, nor the battle to the strong, neither yet bread to the wise, nor yet riches to men of understanding, nor yet favour to men of skill, <sup>but</sup> time and chance happeneth to them all.

12 For <sup>man</sup> also knoweth not his time: <sup>as</sup> the fishes that are taken in an evil net, and as the birds that are caught in the snare; <sup>so</sup> <sup>are</sup> <sup>the</sup> sons of men snared in an evil time, when it falleth suddenly upon them.

13 ¶ This <sup>wisdom</sup> have I seen also under the sun, and it <sup>seemed</sup> great unto me:

substance: and the most skilful in any trade, science, or profession are far from sure of being most favoured or employed. But there are favourable, or unfavourable times, into which men are cast: the former often procure success to far inferior talents and exertions; under the latter, no abilities or efforts can prevent disappointment. There are also various events, which cannot be foreseen, that determine a man's success in any enterprise, and have a decisive effect upon his lot in life. These seem to come by chance; yet they are the appointment of God; but they, who do not regard him, charge them on fortune, and exclaim against this imaginary being, as blind, capricious, or partial. These things, however, are thus ordered on purpose, that ungodly men might be left wholly in uncertainty. There is a time allotted to all men, in which to seek and obtain the most important advantages: but in general they know not, or observe not, that time, but suffer it to slip past them unimproved; and then they are involved in unforeseen calamities, as fishes and fowls are in the net or snare, and the time of trouble and of death comes upon them suddenly, so that they cannot escape. This is the case, especially with those, who postpone the great concerns of their souls to some future opportunity: they are often given up to a strong delusion; and are caught in Satan's net, which he baits with some worldly object, for the sake of which they reject or abuse the gospel, and go on in sin, till they suddenly fall into everlasting destruction.

V. 13—18. Solomon illustrated his remarks from an incident that had fallen under his observation; in which great wisdom, with eminent success, had been shewn for the good of others, without any advantage to the person himself.—A mighty king came with every warlike preparation, to besiege a small city that was very feebly garrisoned, and yet he failed of success: for a certain poor man, by his sagacity, contrivance, and prudent management, delivered the city. But when the danger was over, and the poor man's assistance was no more wanted, he was totally neglected and forgotten, through the ingratitude of his citizens, and their contempt of his poverty. This event was a proof that wisdom is decidedly preferable to strength; and also that it would be a vain possession, if its recompense were from men; for when the emergency was over, the poor man's wisdom was despised, and his words were not heard. One reason of this is assigned: wise men speak with modesty and gentleness; and though their words are more attended to by a few, who derive great good from them; yet the vociferation, or plausible speeches of the ostentatious go farther with the ignorant and thoughtless multitude: such is man's folly, that the empty and conceited declaimer will frequently be most popular. Wisdom is indeed better than weapons of war; yet it is so much more easy to do harm than good, that one ungodly man, with a little subtlety, address, and fluency of speech, will often prevail against those of the most consummate wisdom, prevent the success of the best concerted plans, overturn the most prudent regulations, and speedily destroy the good that hath long been devising and accomplishing.—'The best and safest counsels cannot so much as be heard or regarded, till people's straits have made them humble, sad, and serious.' (Bp. Patrick.)—'Whatever declaimer thou seest in the church, by enticement and elegance of words, exciting applauses, moving laughter, and stirring up the people to affections of joy; know, that is a sign of folly, both in them that speak, and in them that hear him. For the words of the wise are heard in quiet and moderate silence.' (St. Jerom.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—10. We ought not to think that our enquiries into the word or works of God are useless, because we cannot comprehend all mysteries, or explain all difficulties: for if we proceed with modesty and seriousness, we shall come to many satisfactory determinations; and shall continually be learning such things, as may be useful to others also. When we have had suitable proof of any important truth, we should not waver or hesitate on account of objections:

for in every thing, that relates to the incomprehensible God, we must expect difficulties which we cannot solve. In the midst of the varied and intricate dispensations in the affairs of men, it is of the greatest consequence to be established in the belief, that the wise and righteous are under the special care of the Almighty. If therefore we first seek his favour, and then regulate all our undertakings according to his revealed will, and put our concerns into his hands; we shall be sure, that our great end will be answered, whether we meet with the expected success or not. But we shall either perplex or deceive ourselves, if we attempt to judge of our acceptance by external events: for this is not the rule which the word of God hath appointed. Forgetful of this, some believers increase their load of trouble, by construing their disappointments and afflictions into evidences of his displeasure, and by concluding that they are not his children, or he would not thus deal with them; and a far greater number of unbelievers mistake outward success, for the token and proof of his love to them. But, in this sense, "all things come alike to all, and there is one event to the righteous, and to the wicked." Not that the Lord doth not give a decided preference to the good, and holy, and reverential worshipper, above the profane and unrighteous; but because the complex reasons of his conduct, in dispensing adversity or prosperity to individuals, do not lie level with our capacities. He acts by perfectly wise rules, and according to one consistent plan: but its parts are so various and complicated, that to us they must needs appear confused. We are called to walk by faith; and they, who have no faith, infer that the righteous will never have any decisive advantage above the wicked; and this occasions much of the evil that is done under the sun. Yet it would not be so, if "the hearts of the sons of men were not full of evil; and if madness were not in them:" so that they are therefore glad of a pretence for indulging their lusts, and neglecting their duty. Thus they live and die befooled and infatuated, and are not aware of their madness in rebelling against God, till the scenes, which open to their view in the eternal world, awfully convince them of it. Let us bless God, that we are yet joined to all the living, where there is hope; and let us consider this as a counterbalance to all our troubles; and as we know that we must die, and that after death is the judgment, let us deem preparation for these solemn events the great business of our lives. Thus, when we leave this world, though we shall have no knowledge of, or portion in, any thing that is done under the sun; though we should be forgotten both by those who loved, and those who hated and envied us, and all our competitions and pursuits on earth vanish as a dream; we shall possess a better and a far more enduring substance.—We should then seek acceptance with God for ourselves and our works, before we think of finding satisfaction in outward things: but when we have attained this, we may go our ways, and eat our bread with joy, and drink our wine, or even our water, with a merry heart; for the meanest morsel coming from our Father's love, and in answer to our prayers, will have a peculiar relish. The believer, who is assured of his acceptance, has of all men the best right to be cheerful: peace and joy are his duty, as well as his privilege: nor does his religion debar him from any rational or desirable earthly enjoyment. It requires not celibacy or solitude, or affected austerities; which are the inventions of Satan and Antichrist, in order to affright men from the yoke of Christ, as if it were intolerably galling. But whilst we cultivate the social affections, and endeavour to be agreeable to our friends and relatives; and take the portion assigned us to defray the charges of our pilgrimage, and so to bear our labours with resignation; let us not forget, that our life here is vanity, and a few days of vanity; that all our enjoyments and possessions are passing away; and that we must seek nobler acquisitions, as the portion of our souls in the eternal world. We should then use all these things according to the rule of God's law, and in subserviency to his glory; and whatever our outward adorning or indulgence be, we should be careful, that our spiritual garments be always white, and free from spot or blemish; and that we be continually anointed, adorned, and refreshed, by the influences of the Holy Ghost. Nor may we permit either the comforts or the trials of life to render us inattentive to our various duties. We have each a work to do. Sinners have the salvation of their souls to seek after, and the assurance of that salvation: believers have a great work to do in order to evidence their faith, adorn the gospel, glorify God, and serve their generation. Magistrates, ministers, the rich and the poor, the learned and unlearned, in their various situations, may all find some work to do; and they are called to do it with their might, and to the utmost of their abilities. The speedy approach of death should cause us to quicken our pace, and double our diligence in our proper employment; seeing "there is no work, nor device, nor knowledge, nor wisdom, in the grave whither we are going," and to which we approach every moment. Alas! how wretched are they, whose bodies are conveyed to the tomb, and their souls into an eternal state, before they have properly begun the great work of life! And if sorrow could enter heaven, methinks believers would there mourn over their lost opportunities of doing good to their fellow-sinners on earth.

V. 11-18. Whilst we guard against supineness and procrastination; we should also beware of self-dependence in our undertakings; otherwise we shall meet with disappointment and vexation: for every one may observe, in all places under the sun, that no abilities or external advantages can ensure success. Happy then are they, whose works are in the hands of God: he will give success to them, if that be best; or he will recompense the intention when unsuccessful: he appoints that "time and chance, which happen to all men:" he enables to run the race, and then confers the prize: he gives strength and victory, wisdom and favour, opportunity, and understanding to embrace it; grace and glory, and every other good thing, to them that walk uprightly. But they, who know not his accepted time, and the day of their visitation, who do not seek him whilst he may be found, and so waste their lives in the pursuit of earthly vanities, will be inextricably entangled in the snare of Satan, and perish suddenly without remedy. Whatever opportunities we may slip, whatever advantages we miss, and whatever calamities befall us, through unforeseen and apparently casual events, or our own impolicy: if we be but careful not to neglect the salvation of our souls, a few days will set all right. But superior talents, and even great success, will be a mere vanity to him, who neglects the one thing needful. Nay, even the good works of wise and pious men often expose them to present vexations. If we would not be rendered uneasy by perpetual disappointments, we must not expect much gratitude from men, for the most disinterested and beneficial services; but learn to do good from a regard to the honour of God, and in hopes of his gracious acceptance. In this way we shall "not be weary of well-doing, assured that in due season we shall reap, if we faint not."—Wisdom and grace are indeed far more valuable than wealth, power, weapons of war, or any external accomplishments; yet they are seldom much respected in the poor and obscure. Under urgent distresses, indeed, men will sometimes regard the counsels of a poor wise man; and be willing to use his superior skill, to serve a present turn, or promote their own interest. But when such friends are no more wanted, they will rarely be remembered: nay, they may assure themselves, that their wisdom will by numbers be despised, and their words disregarded. For men are so attracted by glare and noise, that the magnificent, the froward, and the loquacious, will ever be the favourites of the ignorant unthinking multitudes with which the world abounds, and bear rule among them; and the wise must be contented to speak in quiet, and with effect, to the few, who are more desirous to profit, than to be flattered and amused. And this is not only the common case in popular assemblies; but even in those places, where men meet together to hear the word of God: but often prefer a smoother doctrine, and are more attentive to the embellishments of the preacher, than to his important message. Thus ministers are tempted to accommodate their discourses to the corrupt taste of the audience; and in this way especially "one sinner destroyeth much good," and disseminates loose doctrines, to the deception of many souls, and the great scandal of the gospel: whilst "many follow his pernicious ways, by means of whom the way of truth is evil spoken of." But whilst we lament these ruinous follies and mistakes of mankind; let us watch against ingratitude to our benefactors, especially to any poor man who hath been useful to us; let us learn to judge of men by their wisdom and piety, and not by their wealth or splendour; let us submit to the will, and depend on the power and mercy, of our God; and then none of our labours will be in vain, however now neglected. And seeing, that the great Deliverer of sinners from the wrath to come, and from the power of Satan, when he became poor for our sakes, was so despised and hated, nay, even now is treated with so much ingratitude and contempt; and seeing we ourselves are so often forgetful of our obligations, and inattentive to his wise and gracious words; we have the less reason to complain, if we meet with similar treatment in this evil world.

NOTES.

CHAP. X. V. 1. When the perfumer has compounded any precious ointment with great skill and attention; if he do not cover it carefully, the flies, attracted by the fragrancy, will be entangled in it, and there die and putrify; and this will spoil the perfume, and render the ointment noisome. Thus, when a man has acquired, with great care and pains, a high reputation for wisdom, or any other honourable qualification; if he remit his watchfulness, and be heedless, self-indulgent, or imprudent, only in a few instances, and those by no means heinous, they will tarnish his character, and sink him into neglect. For in proportion as a person becomes conspicuous, he is the more strictly watched, great things are expected from him, and less allowance made for his infirmities: nay, envy and malevolence become more busy in reducing his character to the ordinary level; and in impeding those useful designs which his credit, if it had not been impaired, might have rendered successful. So that those mistakes which would scarcely have been counted blemishes in another man, will be deemed also inexcusable crimes in him; and numbers will be gratified by detecting and exposing them.

V. 2, 3. A wise man's understanding is employed about the duties of his station, and his heart is in his work; it is his delight, and he does it earnestly, and he therefore learns to do it skillfully, as a man who uses his right hand. But a fool employs no contrivance, because he is heartless as to every good thing; he understands any subject better than his own profession, and any one's duty better than his own. So that he goes about his work, thus to speak, in a left-handed manner, and makes nothing of it. "A wise man always takes honest courses; but a fool turns into byways." Nay, such persons discover their ignorance and folly on every occasion: they cannot take a journey, or walk abroad, but they run into such gross and evident errors, or engage in such disputes and projects, as expose them to every body; for they have not wisdom enough to conceal their own emptiness and mischievous dispositions.

V. 4. (Note, viii. 3-5.) If the prince have taken offence at the conduct of any of his subjects or officers, the wisdom of the person concerned consists in keeping his place, and quietly attending to its duties; not being influenced either by resentment or fear, to recede, or to excite any commotions in the state. For, a submissive healing conduct wins upon and pacifies those princes, who have been greatly and even justly displeased; whereas, rashness and violence generally end in the ruin of the offending party.

V. 5-7. Solomon allowed that princes often occasioned many evils by their misconduct and neglect, which could not be vindicated, though they did not justify the disaffected. One abuse especially he had remarked, by which rulers became accessory to the crimes of others, and all the mischiefs which they perpetrated. Namely, when from any selfish motive, or from partiality, or caprice, they preferred inexperienced and imprudent men, from low stations, to the highest dignities; which they disgraced by their imperious, mercenary, and rash behaviour; whilst the nobles, whose rank, education, and knowledge of affairs entitled them to consideration, qualified them for such eminent places, and rendered them superior to the mean oppressions practised by indigent upstarts, were degraded, and placed under the command of their inferiors; which is, as if slaves rode in state, and princes were required to walk about by their sides, to do them honour. Indeed, it naturally gives umbrage, when men of inferior rank, though eminent for abilities, wisdom, and probity, are advanced above the nobles; but much more so, when the talents and dispositions of the favourites are as mean as their extraction. (Notes, Prov. xix. 10. xxx. 22.)

V. 8-10. The sacred writer appears, in these verses, to continue his discourse, and to caution subjects, when aggrieved by evils which proceed from the ruler, not to seek redress in a precipitate manner, or to yield to the suggestions of resentment and pride. This advice he enforces by apt illustrations. As, he that diggeth a pit for another, may probably fall into it himself; so he who violently seeks the ruin of an obnoxious competitor, will probably compass his own destruction. He who breaks a hedge that divides between one man's field and another's, may expect to be bitten by a serpent that lies concealed in it; and thus the man who attempts to break down the fences of law and authority on account of some personal offence, may expect a fatal end. He that should attempt to remove the stones, which served for landmarks, or that were too heavy for him, would probably be crushed by them; and so will he who attempts to subvert an established government. And if a man intends to cleave a knotty block of wood, he must first procure proper tools, and duly sharpen them, and then proceed cautiously and skillfully, otherwise he will endanger and weary himself to little purpose; thus they that would compass practicable and desirable alterations, should proceed with caution, and procure proper helpers, and use cool deliberation and steady perseverance; and not expect to carry matters by force and violence, which are not sufficient even to cleave a block of wood. In all these matters, wisdom is profitable to direct to proper means and occasions, and to prevent mischief, and a man's wearying himself in vain. "Without wisdom, whatsoever a man taketh in hand, turneth to his own hurt."

V. 11-15. The serpent was supposed capable of being charmed by certain incantations, which would prevent its biting. (Note, Ps. lxxviii. 5;) but otherwise it could not safely be meddled with; and those babblers who by flattery, plausibility, and slander, insinuate themselves into the favour of weak princes, are no better than the serpent. In themselves they may indeed be as despicable as they are poisonous; but they have it in their power to do immense mischief, and must be opposed with great caution. They may be outwitted and supplanted, but it is dangerous to attempt overpowering them, for they do not care whom they destroy, if exasperated. In general, the wise man will gain his advantage by speaking with gentleness, candour, and discretion, and in a manner suited to procure him favour. But the lips of the foolish man, as it were, dig a pit in which to swallow up himself. When he first begins to speak, he betrays his ignorance and impertinence; and if he meets with the least check, he is put off his guard, and becomes like a madman, in rage and abuse. It is in vain, therefore, to enter into any contest with him, for he is full of words, and will speak last, though his discourse be so perplexed, that no one can tell what he intends to do, or what he will say next, or how his impertinent discourse will end. And in like manner, when he undertakes the management of affairs, he is sure to weary himself to no purpose; for he is so inconsiderate and headstrong, that if he undertook a journey to some great city, he would neither be able to find the way, nor be willing to follow another's directions! So that nothing can hinder a wise man's prevailing against such a competitor, except his own indignation give the foolish man an advantage against him to crush him by violence.

17 Blessed art thou, O land, "when thy king is the son of nobles, "and thy princes eat in due season, for strength, and not for drunkenness!

V. 16-19. A prince, who is a child in years, or in ignorance, fickleness, and caprice, is a sore judgment from God to any nation; especially when the nobles, who ought to be able and active statesmen and counsellors, begin and spend their days in sensual indulgence. But the land is specially favoured, and is likely to prosper, where the king is descended from noble progenitors, and inherits their capacity for government: or, as some explain the word, when he is a man of mature years and experience, and when his princes are temperate and apply themselves to business. For as the sluggard lets his house go to decay for want of repairs, till the roof droppeth through, and the whole moulders into ruins; so the kingdom that is governed by careless and profligate rulers, must come to ruin. For whilst they are making feasts, and indulging themselves in wine, as if they had nothing to do but to laugh and be merry; the public treasure is wasted, the national defence is neglected, heavy taxes must be imposed, the people grow discontented, the enemies are emboldened, and every thing concurs to bring heavy calamities on the state. The money which such rulers waste in their luxury, and lavish on the companions of their revels and debaucheries, would have answered all the purposes of good government, and provided for every emergency; but, being thrown away, manifold oppressions, disturbances, and miseries must needs ensue, which a few drunken feasts will very ill compensate.

V. 20. Government, and the distinctions in society, are the appointments of God, and productive of much good to mankind. Kings, magistrates, and great men, therefore, with all their defects, are entitled to respect and honour; and as none ought openly to revile and wish evil to them, so malice should not be indulged in the heart, or ill wishes allowed, even in thought, against them, or vented in the most private manner. And men should remember that secret discourses and combinations of this kind are often detected by means, almost as unlikely as if a bird of the air should convey the intelligence to the parties concerned.—Kings have their spies, where they are not suspected. Their ears are as long as their arms, and God himself often wonderfully brings treason to light.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1-10. A reputation for wisdom and honour is not only more valuable than precious ointment, but more difficult to be preserved from losing its good savour, and becoming offensive. (vii. 1.)—Seeing we are never entirely secure against tarnishing our characters by one folly or other, as long as we live, this may be considered as an additional reason why the day of a wise man's death is better than that of his birth: for when he dies, his reputation is established, and a sanction given to all that he hath laboured for the good of mankind; whereas the indiscretion of an unguarded hour, or an incidental transgression, may at any time bring all his endeavours and devices into disrepute.—Every professed Christian, in proportion as he is zealous for religion, may be considered as "in reputation for wisdom and honour," and a little folly will be more offensive in him than in another. The world will watch him more narrowly, and censure him more severely: his profession condemns their principles and conduct, and excites their enmity, and therefore they will make no allowances for him. Every minister of the gospel is, in a higher sense, "in reputation for wisdom and honour," he is "a city set upon a hill, that cannot be hid:" his faithful preaching will condemn numbers, and they will watch for matter of accusation against him, that he may appear no better than they. How careful then should we be to avoid all appearance of evil! and how ready to make any sacrifice, rather than give a handle to those who seek to hinder our usefulness, by blasting our characters! In general, retirement is most eligible; for few are much in the way of temptation and observation, without in some degree weakening their own influence. As men arrive at greater eminence in these respects, they are more noticed, will be more severely judged, and their mistakes will be of more extensively bad consequence. Alas, how many have we heard of, whose examples have illustrated these observations ! Men of eminent reputation for abilities, for zeal, piety, and usefulness, who have sunk into neglect, or even become a disgrace to the cause of truth, by being overcome by temptation, or perhaps unjustly suspected of some crime, for want of a proper attention to appearances ! It is in such cases vain to exclaim of the censoriousness of mankind : we all ought to know that the world is censorious, especially towards religious characters ; and for that reason to " provide for things honest, not only in the sight of God, but also before men," and by well-doing, to put to silence the ignorance of foolish men ; and to pray without ceasing, for grace to enable us " to walk with wisdom towards them that are without."—A man's wisdom is evinced by his heart being engaged, and his ingenuity exerted, in his proper work, that he may be skillful and successful in it. How necessary then is it, that ministers should give themselves wholly to their proper work ; that they may be workmen that need not be ashamed, and that their profiting may appear unto all men ! Indeed, every man who does not delight in God's commandments, will at length be proved emphatically a fool. But we meet with great numbers among every class in society who prove themselves ignorant and foolish upon every emergency : all their wisdom consists in plausible professions and artifices, which continually fail them ; and their words and works betray their real characters to all around them.—It is generally our wisdom peaceably to abide in our places in the community ; to avoid giving needless offence, especially to our superiors ; and if we have inadvertently offended, to disarm resentment by submissions ; for they who rashly engage in opposition to authority, seldom escape without some grievous calamity. In this evil world, we must expect that rulers, as well as others, will mistake and do wrong ; and we should be prepared to make proper allowances. But they should be warned of their duties, and apprised of the imprudence and bad consequences of " setting folly in great dignity, and causing the rich to sit in low places." Yet, when such grievances are experienced, without great caution, men will incur far worse consequences in attempting to redress them. In every case, resentment and pride are dangerous counsellors ; and hasty and violent measures are seldom either equitable or expedient. They, who seek the downfall of others, will themselves often fall into mischief : in attempting to break through customary rules and limits, immense dangers are incurred, and wisdom is not only profitable to direct us what ought to be done, but in what manner it may safely be attempted. Times and occasions must be waited for ; prudent contrivance will go much further than brutal force ; and they who attempt even salutary alterations, without having previously adopted suitable plans, and engaged proper instruments, will seldom succeed.

V. 11-20. They who would do good, must not despise their opposers, though they be superficial and worthless. Men may do much mischief, with so mean a capacity as could never have attained to any thing useful. A vain babbler wants neither power nor inclination to bite like a serpent. Gentle means are commonly most prevalent ; and they whose words are soft and insinuating, the language of truth, piety, and goodness, will have most influence ; whilst the vehement and endless vociferation, the furious passion, the boastings, railings, menaces, and mischievous madness, which many employ, only prove their own folly, prevent the success of their own purposes, and give their opponents the advantage against them. Such as are most full of words, seldom most abound in sense or prudence ; and they who will have the last word in dispute, have seldom truth on their side ; great talkers are frequently very defective when they proceed to action, so that they lose themselves in the plainest matters ; and, alas, how many foolish men weary themselves with vain labour about religion, and will not know the only way to Zion, the city of our God ! When the government of kingdoms devolves on those who are weak and wicked, we should remember that the Lord is displeased, and so use proper means of averting his indignation : and it becomes us to be thankful, when affairs of state are prudently and successfully managed.—Alas, how many indulge sloth, and spend their time in feasting, intemperance, and vain mirth, to the ruin of their families and of their souls ! and we need not wonder that the affairs of nations are often ruined in the same way : for though money is not worthy of being idolized, or even hoarded, yet it is too valuable to be wasted in vanity and luxury. It cannot indeed purchase pardon of sin, or spiritual grace and peace, but in respect of outward concerns, it may be said to answer all things. Besides providing what is needful and convenient for ourselves and families, it will subserve a thousand purposes of benevolence, and even of piety. It may endow alms-houses, hospitals, and schools ; it may educate and support ministers and missionaries ; and no good work can well be accomplished without it. But very few men indeed hit the true medium in this respect, and many well-meaning persons deprive themselves of the ability of doing good to numbers, by an inconsiderate profusion ; and whilst they shun the vice of covetousness, they run headlong into the opposite extreme. But wisdom teaches us to estimate every thing according to the benefit which may be derived from it, and to apply it to its proper use ; to attend on the duties of our station, and not to intermeddle with matters that belong not to us ; to avoid doing or speaking those things in secret, which being detected, might tend to our injury and disgrace ; to curb every rising of malevolence, and to fear God, honour the king, and render unto every man his due.

NOTES.

CHAP. XI. V. 1, 2. Solomon had repeatedly recommended a cheerful use of worldly things, as a remedy against their vanity : and here he adds an exhortation to the liberal use of them in acts of beneficence. The expression, " cast thy bread upon the waters," may perhaps allude to the husbandman's casting his bread-corn, which he could ill spare, upon a marshy soil, or even on the waters that covered it, where apparently he had little prospect of a crop. Men should deduct a considerable proportion from their gains, earnings, and expenses, according to their measure of riches, to supply the wants of the needy, and even of the unworthy and ungrateful. This may seem like throwing their provisions into the waters : but it will certainly not be lost, and long afterwards they will reap the benefit of it. They are therefore exhorted to give a portion of their substance, not merely to one or two, but to seven or eight, to as many as occasion requires ; and not to object, that they have already given to this or the other person. And this they should do, under a conviction of the instability of human affairs, and as sensible that all their other possessions may soon be torn from them, but that this will be safe, and reserved for them, in all possible emergencies. ' Here again Solomon contradicts the vulgar principle, upon which covetous wretches move. They think all is lost, that is given away in charity : no such matter, saith the preacher, the fruit of it will be found hereafter, beyond what can be imagined ! Oh, saith the covetous man again, I know not what will be hereafter, therefore it is best to save whilst I may. No, saith the preacher, for that very reason give.' (Acts xi. 28-30.)—' For thou knowest not how calamitous the times may shortly be, and then the good thou hast done will stand thee in greater stead, than all the goods thou enjoyest, which perhaps may be taken from thee, and leave thee nothing to do good withal ; but make thee an object of other men's charity, which no person hath greater reason to expect, than he who, when he had wherewithal, hath been kind to others in that condition. When thou thinkest not of it, God will requite thee, either in this world, or in the next.' (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 3-6. The clouds exhale the water, and it is treasured up in them, on purpose that they may empty themselves in watering the earth, and in diffusing plenty. Thus God enables men to get wealth, that they may do good with it : nor can their riches profit them, if they do not benefit others. Speedily they will be cut down as trees : and as the tree continues where it fell, so will men abide in that state in which death leaves them ; and this will be according as they have, or have not, brought forth good fruit. Selfish men object to this duty, from their circumstances, families, or necessary expenses, and especially from the vices and ingratitude of the poor. But the husbandman, who should thus object to the plowing or sowing of his ground, or reaping his crop, because the wind was cold or rough, or the clouds threatened rain, would miss his seedtime, and lose his harvest : and so will they who have always an excuse ready when a good work is proposed. Men are ready to say, we cannot tell in what manner we shall be repaid for the trouble and expense of our charity. But can they understand how the spirit or soul is united to the body ? or how the body is fashioned in the womb ? And if a man be unable to understand these things, how can it be expected that he should know the other works of God, who maketh all ? Every good action, therefore, which springs from a proper principle, ought to be considered as sowing the seed of a future harvest ; true wisdom consists in doing this daily, and in every part of the day, without sparing trouble or expense ; and if many endeavours to be useful terminate in disappointment, this should not be a discouragement ; none can know which of all their attempts will be most successful, or be certain that it will not succeed.

V. 7, 8. Ungodly men expect the comfort of life from health and prosperity, which are pleasant to the mind as light is to the eyes, and as the sun cheers us after a gloomy season. But should a man live many years, and enjoy every pleasure of life through them all ; let him remember that this season will be soon over ; tedious days of sickness and pain may precede death ; and if these be his good things, an eternity of darkness and despair will follow. All this outward prosperity then is a mere vanity.

CHAP. XII.

An exhortation to early piety; and a description of the infirmities of old age, and the approach and consequences of death. 1-7. A repeated declaration that all is vanity; the preacher's purpose and care in his instructions; and the solemn conclusion of his subject, in a charge to fear and obey God, as the whole of man, and thus to prepare for judgment. 8-12.

REMEMBER now thy Creator in the days of thy youth, <sup>a</sup>while the evil days come not, nor the years draw nigh, <sup>b</sup>when thou shalt say, I have no pleasure in them;

2 While <sup>c</sup>the sun, or the light, or the moon, or the stars, be not darkened, <sup>d</sup>nor the clouds return after the rain:

NOTES.

CHAP. XII. V. 1. The word rendered Creator in this place is plural, and may refer to the expression used at the creation of Adam and Eve, "Let us make man;" (Notes, Gen. i. 26. Job xxxv. 10.)—This exhortation is connected with the close of the preceding chapter. Instead of that vain and vicious conduct which tends to so many future evils, Solomon recommends an early attention to religion. In allusion to man's natural forgetfulness of God, he calls upon young persons to "remember their Creator." They should remember his glorious perfections, as displayed in the work of creation; their own relations and obligations to him, and dependence on him, as their Creator and Lord; the duties thence resulting, and the account that they must render; the value of his favour, and the power of His wrath, in whom they live, move, and are. They should remember their sins against their Creator, and repent and seek forgiveness of them; and their duties, and set about performing them, in dependence on his mercy and grace, and a desire to live to his glory. This should be done, as early as may be, whilst the body is vigorous and the spirits active; and before those evil days or years approach, in which no pleasure can be found, except in communion with God and in the hope of heaven. At that trying season there will be no occasion for the additional anguish of reviewing a mispent life; repentance and conversion will be attended with peculiar and mighty difficulties; and the circumstance of not having renounced sin and worldly vanities, till a man be forced to say, "I have no pleasure in them," will render his sincerity very questionable to his own conscience. The word rendered youth seems to mean the best and choicest season of life.

V. 2-7. This figurative description of old age and its infirmities has furnished the critics with much employment, and a fine field for the display of their ingenuity; but such matters must here be handled with great brevity. In old age, the relish for all pleasures is lost, and men grow indifferent even to those objects which once occasioned the most agreeable sensations: so that the sun, with its pleasant light, and the beautiful moon and stars, are, as it were, obscured to them; or the understanding, imagination, memory, and judgment, the lights of the mind, are so impaired that they seem darkened.—One affliction or pain succeeds another, as clouds return after heavy showers in a rainy season. The hands and arms, with which a man defends himself from assaults or accidents, as watchmen keep the house, grow feeble, and tremble when their help is requisite. The legs and thighs, which as strong men support the body, seem in old age to bend under its weight. The teeth, which used to grind the food, are most of them gone; and the few that remain become useless. The eyes by which the soul looked, as it were, out at the windows, grow dim. Men become disinclined or incapacitated to open their mouths in public debates, having lost their voice with their teeth: or they have no inclination to eat, as they cannot grind or chew their food without pain and difficulty; or they keep at home and retired, their doors being shut towards the street, because they cannot digest their food as formerly. Their rest is so easily disturbed, that they awake, and rise up, uneasy and alarmed, at the least noise, as the singing of a bird, or the crowing of the cock. The voice and the ear, those daughters of music, are no longer capable of performing their functions, or the spirits are too dull to let them attend with satisfaction. Every ascent in the way terrifies them, on account of the labour of climbing; they shun every high place, through fear of falling from it: nay, they feel themselves so feeble and clumsy, that they dread being thrown down, or run over, whenever they walk out. Their heads, covered with white hair, seem to blossom like the almond-tree: every little inconvenience, like the weight, or the chirping, of a grasshopper, is a burden to them, and renders them fretful: or they are bowed, so that their backbone projects like that of a locust, and they have no longer any desire after, or relish for, animal pleasures. Thus man draws nigh to the end of his journey, and will shortly be at his long home or his home of ages. The grave may in some sense be thus called; but the eternal state of happiness or misery, to which the soul removes at death, and to which the body will follow at the resurrection, is far more emphatically so called. When this takes place, others will, either sincerely or insincerely, mourn for him, as he formerly did for others. Then the "silver cord will be loosed:" which may mean, the inexplicable bond of union betwixt body and soul; or the spinal marrow, which continues sensation by the nerves from the brain, to every part of the body. Or the whole verse may be a description of the functions of life, taken from a well; where is a cord to the bowl or bucket, with which the water is drawn, a wheel by which the more easily to raise it, a cistern into which it may be poured, and a pitcher, or vessel, to carry it away with; but now all are broken or loosened, and become useless. Thus at death, the lungs cease to play, the heart ceases to beat, the blood to circulate; every vessel becomes useless, the whole surprising contrivance for forming and communicating the blood, which is the life, from the fountain of the heart to every extremity of the body, is now entirely deranged: the silver cord is loosed, the golden bowl is broken, the pitcher and the wheel are marred at once. Then the body returns to its dust, and the soul to God the Creator, to be fixed in a state of happiness or misery, according to the things done in this present life.

V. 9, 10. This address to young persons is peculiarly animated and affecting. Solomon supposes that they would not be convinced that all was vanity, until they had made the trial; that they would desire liberty and opportunity to pursue every pleasure, and to gratify every inclination, and regale every sense, during the vigour of youth; and that they were sanguine in their expectations of happiness. "Well," says he, follow the bent of your desires, wherever they lead you: but be assured at the same time, that for all these things God will call you into judgment." He then exhorts them seriously, to behave so in their youth, as may best remove, or prevent, sorrow and disease in future years, and the wrath of God in a future state; or to guard against both the vehement passions of the mind, and the ungovernable appetites of the body; for childhood and youth are vanity. Even in that early period sickness and death may come, youthful pleasures are vain and empty, and even in childhood and youth the heart is very prone to sin and folly.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Nothing tends more to give us a sanctified and comfortable use of outward things, than liberal and well-directed beneficence. Every work and labour of love to others, for the Lord's sake, will prove advantageous to ourselves; the more abundantly we bring forth these fruits of faith and grace, the better we shall be prepared for every evil that can befall us on earth; and that, which is thus expended, will be better secured, and bear higher interest, than any other part of our property. Unbelievers indeed think it all thrown away, as bread cast upon the waters: but faith knows it to be seed sown in well-watered land, which after a time of patient waiting, will yield a plenteous increase. Unbelief therefore hoards against the evil day; faith lends it to the Lord, to be repaid when he sees it to be wanted. Unbelief, as the parent of avarice, resembles the clouds exhaling and retaining the waters; but faith working by love, resembles the clouds dispensing their stores, and emptying themselves on the parched earth. The covetous man, however, will not part with his idolized treasures till death tears him from them. Then, as he lived to himself, he is cut down like a barren tree, and cast into the fire, there to remain for ever; but the believer, who hath lived to God, and brought forth fruit as a tree of righteousness, will flourish in the paradise of God for ever. Yet selfishness will continue to make excuses and objections; and the dread of present loss, self-denial, or inconvenience, render men reluctant to every proposed method of doing good; thus they lose their seed-time and harvest, and their hoarded abundance will rise up against them for their condemnation at the last day. But let us rely on God's word, and leave him to make it good in his own time and manner. Let the rich be liberal in these profitable services, and others according to their ability. Let not ministers be slack or discouraged in their work, because they do not see their prayers answered, and their labours blessed. Let them sow the good seed plentifully, and with perseverance, and they will find it after many days: the Lord works by them, at those times, and in those ways, of which they are not aware; they cannot tell which sermon or exhortation he may please to bless, or whether they may not all be useful. Let it suffice, that God will accept and recompense every well-meant endeavour: and the whole will subserve the purposes of his glory, and the salvation of souls. And let no Christian be weary of well-doing, in every way. This will do more to render life comfortable, than carnal prosperity and pleasure.—The light of the Sun of Righteousness and his healing beams are far more pleasing to the believer's soul, than the light of the sun to his eyes: and though he may expect pain, sickness, and death, yet his Redeemer will not leave him comfortless: his sun may be clouded and eclipsed; but it shall never go down to leave him in darkness and despair. Soon will the longest life of earthly pleasure expire: and how numerous and dreary will be the days, the years, the countless, endless ages of darkness, which await those who die in their sins. Let the careless and the carnal remember this, and prepare for their closing scene. Nor can young persons begin this needful work too soon. Whilst their spirits are lively and their hearts cheerful; let them so temper their joy, as to recollect continually the account they must give of their whole conduct. And let those, (alas, how numerous are they!) who determine to give a loose to every appetite, and rush into every scene of dissipation and vicious pleasure, to which they can have access, take this along with them, 'that God registers every one of their sinful thoughts and desires, their idle words, and wicked works; and will at last produce the account of millions of crimes, which they committed with their jovial comrades, and speedily forgot.' If they would, then, avoid remorse, terror, and anguish in future years; if they would have hope and comfort on a dying bed; if they would escape temporal and eternal misery; let them learn to bridle their passions, in the fear of God, and in the view of this great season of retribution; let them remember the vanity of youthful pleasures, and the uncertainty of human life; and let them anticipate those reflections which, neglecting this advice, they may hereafter make on their own conduct, when oppressed with pain and terror, or when condemned at the tribunal of the righteous Judge.

3 In the day when 'the keepers of the house shall tremble, and the strong men shall bow themselves, and the grinders *cease because they are few, *and those that look out of the windows be darkened,

4 And the doors shall be shut in the streets, when the sound of the grinding is low, and he shall rise up at the voice of the bird, and <sup>h</sup>all the daughters of music shall be brought low :

5 Also when they shall be afraid of that which is high, and fears shall be in the way, and the <sup>h</sup>almond-tree shall flourish, and the grasshopper shall be a burden, and desire shall fail : <sup>h</sup>because man goeth to his long home, <sup>h</sup>and the mourners go about the streets :

8 ¶ Vanity <sup>h</sup>of vanities, saith the Preacher ; all is vanity.

9 And <sup>h</sup>moreover, because the Preacher was wise, <sup>h</sup>he still taught the people knowledge ; yea, <sup>h</sup>he gave good heed, and sought out, and set in order, many proverbs.

10 The <sup>h</sup>Preacher sought to find out <sup>h</sup>acceptable words : and that which was <sup>h</sup>written was upright, even words of truth.

12 And further, <sup>h</sup>by these, my son, be admonished : of making many books there is no end ; and much <sup>h</sup>study is <sup>h</sup>a weariness of the flesh.

14 For <sup>h</sup>God shall bring every work into judgment, with every secret thing, whether it be good, or whether it be evil.

V. 8—10. In the view of this near approach of death, Solomon (who probably wrote this description from his own experience,) again declares, that "all is vanity, and vanity of vanities." (Note, i. 2 :) and then he proceeds to close his subject in the most solemn manner. He had been renowned and eminent in all kinds of wisdom : but the best use he could make of it, was by continuing to teach the people knowledge. With great care and labour, he had sought out, arranged, and published many proverbs, for their instruction : he had bestowed pains to find out words suited to convey his meaning, in the plainest, most convincing, and agreeable manner to their minds ; and what he had written was upright and true, and worthy of their full credence and strictest observance.

V. 11—14. The words, which prophets and wise men employed in instructing the people, were intended to be as goads, which cause the sluggish ox to mend his pace when drawing in the yoke ; they would therefore occasion pain, whilst they alarmed the conscience, and shewed men their guilt and danger ; but they tended to quicken them, in fleeing from the wrath to come, and in walking in the way to heaven. The masters of assemblies, the priests or prophets who taught the people, when assembled at the temple or in other places ; and who received their instructions from the one great Shepherd of Israel, intended them to be as nails, fastened in their memories, consciences, and judgments, so as not easily to be removed ; that they might there remain, for their establishment in the truths and ways of God. Solomon therefore, with the authority and affection of a father, exhorts every reader to be admonished by the instructions which he hath here given. To write a great many books, was an almost endless work, not suited to the shortness of human life ; and the study of the writer, and even of the reader, would in that case be a great weariness to the flesh. Nor was it at all necessary ; for whatever books were written, or studies pursued, they would all be vanity and vexation ; except they led to this, as the conclusion of the whole matter, that "to fear God, and keep his commandments, is the whole of man." The word duty, is very improperly added in the translation ; for it is the whole interest, privilege, honour, and happiness, as well as duty, of man, to fear the wrath and seek the favour of God ; to reverence his perfections, and to become his spiritual worshippers and servants, walking in all his ordinances and commandments, blameless. For after this vain life is over, another scene will succeed, and men shall be judged, and recompensed according to their conduct, secret as well as open, and whether good or evil. (Marg. Ref.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—7. All the wickedness and misery of man spring from his forgetfulness of God, to which he is prone even from his youth. Though every object around us, and our own reason and conscience, and even existence, proclaim his power and godhead ; yet is he scarcely in our thoughts, whilst left to ourselves : and men in general remain ignorant or careless about their Creator and daily benefactor ; and neither fear, love, serve, nor trust him ; as his glorious perfections and their infinite obligations to him demand of them. We need, therefore, to be called upon to remember our Creator, that we may perceive our need of a Redeemer and a sanctifier ; and may be excited to return to the Lord, by the way that he hath opened, that being reconciled to him, we may walk with Him through this evil world. We should also call upon our children and the thoughtless and inexperienced young persons around us, to attend to these neglected truths and duties ; and remind them of the advantages of beginning this needful work in the dawn of life, and of the folly and hazard of neglecting it. It is a great happiness to be prevented from contracting those bad habits and connections, which render a change in after years, like cutting off a right hand or foot ; to avoid that injustice and mischief to others, which often distress the conscience to the end of life ; to be secure from the danger of dying in sin, or of living to be hardened by its deceitfulness ; or of having the great work of life to begin, when the evil days come, in which pains and infirmities destroy the comfort of every possession ; and are a heavy load to bear, without the accumulation of so many sorrows, anxieties, and terrors, as must needs accompany a late repentance, in those few instances in which it takes place. Happy then are they, who serve God from their early youth, and are useful through their whole lives ; who have divine consolations to refresh them, when other comforts are withdrawn or become insipid ; and who know, that "when flesh and heart shall fail, God will be the strength of their heart, and their portion for ever !" If we are not previously cut off, a few years will terminate all that vigour, activity, or comeliness, about which we are so careful, and in which we are so apt to glory. The decay of our bodies will even obstruct the operations of our mental faculties : our dear friends and relatives will, one after another, be torn from our bleeding side ; one pain and disease will succeed another ; we shall become feeble and helpless as children ; our limbs will totter under the weight of our bodies ; every sense and organ will lose its power of giving pleasure ; we shall not derive satisfaction from beautiful objects or prospects, from music, from food, or from any of the delights of the sons of men : every undertaking will then excite terror, weariness, or disquietude ; our sleep will be broken, and motion uneasy ; and the trials of our patience will probably render us a trial to the patience of those around us. Every circumstance will then remind us, that we are speedily to remove to our long home, and that when the mourners have paid their customary tribute to us, we shall be little more thought of ; whilst our bodies are mouldering in the grave, and our souls are fixed in an unchangeable state. Let us then seek the Lord and his salvation, before the vital powers fail, and "the dust return to the earth as it was, and the soul to God who gave it."

V. 8—14. What a complicated vanity is life and all its pursuits, to that man whose treasure is on earth, and who has every thing to dread in a future world ! But as it is a season to prepare for eternity, and to do good on earth, life is no vanity ; and death to him who thus employs his days has no terrors : here only can we find substantial good. To teach man this knowledge is the work of every preacher : he, who carefully attends to this, according to the Scripture, is wise, though his station be obscure and his abilities mean : and the man, who possesses superior rank and talents, cannot more honourably employ them, than in copying the example of this wise and royal preacher ; in devising proper means, and in seeking out acceptable words, even those of uprightness and truth, set forth in the most convincing and persuasive manner, in order to bring men to seek and serve God. But indeed the pure word of God, however set forth in acceptable language, must disquiet the negligent and disobedient ; for it is "quick and powerful, and sharper than a two-edged sword, and it pierces" the sinner's conscience, and fills it with terror and remorse. These are, however, faithful wounds, and intended to urge men forward in the way of salvation : and when they have produced their effect, peace and consolation will follow. All, who are employed as masters of assemblies, or teachers of congregations, derive their authority, abilities, and instructions, from the one good Shepherd, who laid down his life for the sheep. Their endeavour should be to fasten divine truths, as nails, in the minds of their hearers, that they may abide with them, and make a durable impression : and the authority of him that sent them ought to be recognized in them and their message. They should, however, keep close to their instructions ; for if the plain truths of Scripture do not produce the desired effect, nothing will. There is indeed no end of the volumes, which are written and read with immense labour and fatigue ; and instead of rendering men wiser, holier, or happier, they often increase their pride, and contempt of God's word. But whether we consider honour, riches, pleasures, learning, or abilities ; the man, who had them all in the greatest abundance, and tried them at the utmost advantage, pronounces them all to be vanity. Let us then be admonished by his words, and profit by his experience : let us learn from him the conclusion of the whole matter, that "to fear God, and keep his commandments, is the whole of man : let us then cease "being careful, and troubled about many things," and attend to this "one thing needful, and choose this good part that shall never be taken from us : let us now come to him as a merciful Saviour, who will soon appear as an omnipotent and omniscient Judge ; when "he will bring to light the hidden things of darkness, and manifest the counsels of all hearts," and judge the secrets of men ; then shall we all appear before his tribunal, and "receive according to the things done in the body, whether they be good or evil." "Let us therefore give diligence, that we may be found of him in peace, without spot, and blameless."

THE SONG OF S O L O M O N.

There can be no reasonable doubt, but that Solomon was the writer of this book, as well as of the two which precede: 'and that it was always looked upon as a holy book, treating of some spiritual and divine matter, appears from its being placed among the rest of that kind.' (Bp. Patrick.)—It is indeed evident, that it was received among the canonical books of the Jews, (probably by Ezra, an inspired writer,) soon after the Babylonish captivity; and that it formed a part of that sacred volume, which, in the time of Christ, was called "the Scriptures," and "the oracles of God."—It does not, indeed, appear that it was expressly quoted by any writer of the New Testament; yet the coincidence of its general argument, and of particular sentiments, with many passages, in both the Old and New Testament, is well worthy of consideration. (Ps. xlv. Is. liv. 5. lxi. 10. lxii. 4, 5. Hos. ii. 16—20. Matt. ix. 15. xxii. 2. xxv. 1—11. John iii. 29. 2 Cor. xi. 2. Eph. v. 23—27. Rev. xix. 7—9. xxi. 2. 9. xxii. 17.) (Compare also i. 4. with John vi. 44—iv. 7. with Eph. v. 27.—v. 2. with Rev. iii. 20.—vii. 1. with Is. lii. 7. Eph. vi. 15.—viii. 11. with Is. v. 1—7. Matt. xxi. 33. 43.—viii. 14 with Rev. xxii. 20.)—This coincidence, joined with the general testimony both of the Jewish and Christian church, through a long succession of ages; (with but few exceptions, and those not peculiarly decided in respect of evangelical truth and piety,) gives the book a very high sanction, not only as genuine, but also as divinely inspired.—It may perhaps also appear to the attentive and serious reader, that the allegory itself is a kind of prophecy; and that particular passages, soberly explained, according to the known rules of interpreting allegories, are prophetic of the coming of Christ in our nature, the abolition of the Mosaic dispensation, the calling of the Gentiles, and the enlargement of the church, (ii. 9. 17. viii. 1. 8, 9;) and more than this cannot be expected from the nature of the composition.—We learn from the sacred historian, that Solomon wrote above a thousand songs; this, however, alone has been preserved as "the song of songs," the most excellent of songs; and though, as a poetical composition, it is allowed by the best judges to be finished in the highest style of elegance and beauty; yet the pious reader will be apt to think, that it was thus distinguished on another and superior account; namely, the excellency of the subject, and the admirable way in which it is treated.—Learned men have bestowed much pains in shewing the occasion on which Solomon wrote this sacred poem: and most of them imagine, that it was composed on his marriage with Pharaoh's daughter; but this is doubtful. (Note, i. 2:) nor is it certain that it was written so early in his reign; for some think that the tower of Lebanon was not built till a considerable time after that event. (vii. 4.) In short, this song is a divine allegory in the form of a pastoral, which represents the reciprocal love betwixt Christ and his church, under figures taken from the relation and affection which subsist betwixt a bridegroom and his espoused bride; an emblem continually employed in Scripture. It hath some reference to the state of the Jewish church, as waiting for the coming of the promised Messiah: but it likewise accords to the fellowship betwixt Christ and true believers in every age. In order properly to understand it, we must consider the Redeemer as loving and beloved of his church. The marriage-contract is already ratified, but the completion of this blessed union is reserved for the heavenly state. Here on earth the believer loves and rejoices in an unseen Saviour, and seeks his happiness from his spiritual presence; Christ manifests himself to him as he doth not unto the world; and these visits are earnest and foretastes of heavenly joy. But they are interrupted, suspended, or varied on many accounts: they are often lost by negligence or other sins, and can only be recovered by humble repentance and renewed diligence; yet the love on both sides remains unchanged, as to its principle, though varied in the expressions of it. These things are represented in a sort of dialogue; in which the church speaks of Christ, or to him; and he answers, and addresses the church: and the daughters of Jerusalem, (who seem to denote such as are enquiring after this salvation,) are frequently addressed, and reply: thus the varying experiences and correspondent duties, of the believer are delineated in a very animating and edifying manner. But the book should be read with great abstraction of mind from outward things, and with much prayer; lest the carnal passions should be kindled, instead of the spiritual affections being invigorated. And, as it is impossible for any one to enter profitably into the meaning of the inspired writer, who has no spiritual experience of the subject; so an ungodly man will seldom read it with advantage, or indeed without detriment; nor is it any objection to the excellency and usefulness of this sacred poem, to allow that it is peculiarly capable of becoming "a savour of death unto death," to "those who wrest the Scriptures to their own destruction." The spiritual meaning, that is, the instruction intended to be given by the Holy Spirit, speaking by Solomon, should then be principally enquired after; and too minute investigation of the external images, under which it is couched, or of the circumstances and arrangement of the poem, (according to the rules of modern criticism,) will, I apprehend, be found rather unfavourable to edification, than conducive to it.—No doubt, many expressions in it are very difficult to us, both as to the literal meaning, and the spiritual instruction intended by them, if such were intended: and some descriptions must not be judged by modern notions of delicacy, which, in a very vicious age, is apt to be fastidious: but the grand outlines, soberly interpreted, in the obvious meaning of the allegory, so accord to the affections and inward experience of the lively Christian, that he will hardly ever read and meditate upon them, in a spirit of humble devotion, without feeling a conviction, that no other poem of the same kind, extant in the world, could, without manifest violence, be so explained, as to describe the state of his heart, at different times, and to excite admiring, adoring, grateful love to God our Saviour, as this does.

The title, 1. The church, (or the believer,) desires of Christ the tokens of his love, praises him, and expresses her delight in communion with him; confesses that her comeliness is very defective; complains that she had met with ill treatment, and prays to be directed by Christ to the resting-place of his people, 2—7. He instructs her to follow the footsteps of his flock, and comforts her with commendations and promises, 8—11. Mutual gratulations, and professions of love betwixt Christ and the church, 12—17.

NOTES.

CHAP. I. V. 1. Solomon wrote many songs, all of which were doubtless finished in the most poetical manner: but this sacred allegory alone hath been preserved, and inserted in holy writ. It is "the Song of songs;" not only more excellent than all the rest of the songs of Solomon, but than any of those which had been composed by other writers; as it is wholly taken up with describing the glories and excellencies of the divine Saviour, and the love which subsists betwixt him and his redeemed people; which form the interior, most sublime, and heavenly part of true religion.

V. 2. In commenting on this book, I purposely omit most of that which many expositors have, with great labour and ingenuity, adduced, concerning the marriage of Solomon with Pharaoh's daughter, a marriage-feast of seven, or rejoice in thee, we will "remember thy love more than wine: "the upright love thee.

5 I am "black, but "comely, "O ye daughters of Jerusalem, "as the tents of Kedar, as the curtains of Solomon.

more, days' continuance, and various dramatical arrangements, adapted to these views of the subject. It does not appear to me, that a satisfactory proof has been given of any such intention in the writer.—Solomon indeed married Pharaoh's daughter soon after his accession to the throne, (Notes, 1 Kings iii. 1. 2 Chr. viii. 11.) but very little is said in the history concerning this transaction; so that the most of that which is confidently advanced about it is mere conjecture, the fruit of a lively invention. The book itself gives not the smallest intimation about Pharaoh's daughter: for the mention of the horses in Pharaoh's chariot, and the spouse's coming up out of the wilderness, (a wilderness lying between Egypt and Canaan,) will hardly be considered as arguments, by impartial reasoners. We might as well insist on it that she came from Syria, or Moab, because the bridegroom calls her to come from Lebanon and from Hermon. (iv. 8.) No doubt, many allusions are made to the customs then in use at marriages; and so there are in some places of the New Testament: but it has not yet been fully proved, that any of Solomon's marriages so much as gave occasion to this song, any more than that the marriage at Cana gave occasion to the parable of the ten virgins.—But supposing that Solomon's marriage did give the occasion; these questions would arise from the concession: Are we to consider his marriage as the primary subject, and the spiritual meaning as an accommodation? Or was the spiritual meaning eminently intended, and allusions made to the marriage, only in order to convey the spiritual instruction to greater advantage? On the former supposition, I should be apt to think that the primary meaning alone was intended; and should have little inclination to dilate in accommodating the circumstances of a mere epithalamium to spiritual purposes. On the latter, the instruction conveyed by the allegory, or parable, demands the expositor's chief attention, and the circumstances, just so far as they lead to the right interpretation, and no further. If it be a sacred poem, the meaning of the Holy Spirit is primarily to be enquired after; and nothing to be introduced, which carries away the attention from that grand subject; much less any thing which indisposes the mind and heart for it; and, as far as I have examined, the glowing language even of those who would be considered as most cautious in this kind of interpretation, is much more calculated to excite wrong ideas and carnal passions, than Solomon's own words are.—Firmly believing it to be a sacred allegory, I shall endeavour to explain it as such; and only mention the allusions to ancient customs, when they tend to illustrate the subject: and, it will appear, as we proceed, that many particulars cannot, without much violence, be properly interpreted of those external circumstances, which are supposed to have given occasion to the book.—It is also requisite here to observe, that many learned and pious expositors confine the interpretation to the church as a collective body; in a way which seems to disallow the application of it to the affections and experiences of individual believers. Yet the church is nothing else but a company of individual believers; (for hypocrites and formalists, whether in Israel or among Christians, could never sincerely join in the fervent and even rapturous expressions of holy love here used;) so that the language of the church is in fact nothing more than the language of those individuals who compose the church, according to their several stations and circumstances, duties, trials, and varied affections; and the distinction seems only to embarrass the subject.—Some think that, in this verse, the ancient church expresses her earnest longings for the coming of the promised Messiah: but the fervent desires of believers after "fellowship with the Father, and with his Son Jesus Christ," are at least equally intended. The church of established believers may therefore be considered as speaking in the allegorical character of the bride or spouse of Christ; and 'in the most passionate strain wishing for some tokens of love, which is expressed under the metaphor of a kiss.—But there is no mention at all made of the name, condition, or beauty of the person, whose love is desired; nor any account of the beginning or progress of this desire: but he (Solomon) makes her burst out on a sudden, and abruptly, into these words, "Let him kiss me with the kisses of his mouth;" that he might the more artificially describe the nature and force of divine love; which, when it possesses the mind, snatches it so from itself, that it is wholly in him that it loves. It thinks of nothing else, wishes nothing, speaks of nothing, but this alone; and imagines that every body else thinks of the same, and knows of whom it speaks." (Lam. iii. 1. John xx. 15.) (Bp. Patrick.)—"The kisses of his mouth" evidently mean those cheering assurances of reconciliation and endeared love, with which believers are from time to time favoured, especially when deeply humbled for their sins: in the midst of their fears and distresses they obtain such discoveries of the Redeemer's glory and grace, and of his power and willingness to save, as dispel their sorrows, and fill them "with peace and joy in believing," and cause them "to abound in hope by the power of the Holy Ghost." Of these sweet consolations the spouse here speaks, and longs for their renewal, increase, and continuance. And then addressing herself to him, as if present, of whom she before spake as absent, she adds, "for thy love is better than wine." The assurance, the pledges, the consolations of the love of Christ, producing reciprocal love to him, give higher and more exquisite pleasures, than can flow from the exhilaration of wine, or from any animal indulgence.

V. 3. The glorious excellencies of the Redeemer's person and character; the unction of the Holy Spirit without measure; the condescension and love of his undertaking in behalf of sinners; the suitableness and preciousness of his righteousness, atonement, and mediation, and of all the offices he sustains for our benefit, render his name more pleasant to the believer's heart, than the costliest unguent or perfume could be to his senses. The more the truths concerning Christ are examined or explained by the preaching of the gospel, or by

On these accounts, all uncorrupt and upright souls (4.) love the Lord Jesus, in proportion to the degree of their purity, simplicity, and entire devotedness to the worship and service of God. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 4. The thoughts of the excellency of Christ, may be supposed here to remind the spouse of her want of conformity to him; and she longs to follow him more nearly, and be more like him, and more drawn off from all other objects. But she feels also her inability to this, without his special grace; and therefore entreats him to "draw her," especially by the quickening influences of his Spirit; and then she will "run after him," in the ways of holy obedience. Nay, she says, "we will run after thee;" intimating, perhaps, that she should then be enabled to keep up with those believers, who were now far before her in love and holiness; or that she should be enabled to induce and encourage others to run in the same blessed course. Such expressions seem not to have much meaning in any literal interpretation.—The whole verse may be understood after this manner: the first words, "Draw me," are the voice of the spouse; the next, "We will run after thee," the words of the chorus of virgins; and then she speaks again: "The King hath brought me into his chambers;" and they express their joy,—"We will be glad and rejoice in thee." (Bp. Patrick.)—Some here consider the spouse as the ancient church of Israel, praying for the Saviour's coming; and the virgins (2) as converts from among the gentiles; who would then join themselves in vast numbers to the believers of the Jews, and with great alacrity follow him as his zealous disciples.—We learn from the other part of the verse, that the person before spoken of was the King, even that King of Israel, whom Solomon in all his glory feebly represented. The spouse had experienced the comforts of his condescending love and gracious presence; and expected still more endeared and intimate communion with him; and, with all her attendants, resolved to rejoice in him, "remembering his love" (or loves, the token and expression of his love,) "more than wine." Yea, not only we, but all "they who uprightly love thee," will thus rejoice in thee. (Marg. Reading.)

V. 5, 6. The daughters of Jerusalem may here mean such persons as associate with believers, and favour the cause of the gospel, but are not yet established or experienced in the faith: though some consider them as part of the Jewish professed church; and others, as 'foreign congregations,' which is not at all probable. The spouse, however, aims to prevent them from being stumbled by what they witnessed of her circumstances. In some respects she was blackish as the weatherbeaten tents of the Arabian shepherds; but in others she was comely as the magnificent curtains in the palaces of Solomon. The original word signifies dark, as the early dawn. The believer is indeed black by nature; but he is comely, as renewed in part by grace, to the holy image of God: still, however, he is deformed with great remains of sin; but comely, as "accepted in the beloved," "and made the righteousness of God in him." He is contemptible and base in the esteem of men, but honourable and excellent in the judgment of God. He is often poor, unlearned, of mean abilities, and employed in low occupations, for which men despise him; but he is a king and a priest unto God, walks with him, and is his child, and the heir of his eternal glory.—The visible church also is deformed by a large intermixture of hypocrites; and by manifold scandals, heresies, divisions, and controversies, which prevail in almost every part of it; yet the invisible church, which consists of the remnant of true believers, forms "a holy nation, a peculiar people, zealous of good works." Some of these things may here be implied; but it is more immediately meant, that the afflictions of believers and the persecutions of the church, render them base in man's esteem, but comely in the eyes of the Lord. The spouse, therefore, advises the daughters of Jerusalem, not to look at her, either to disdain her on account of her infirmities, or external meanness and distresses, or to take any prejudice against religion on that account. If they saw her black, it was because "the sun had looked upon her;" that is, she had endured temptation and persecutions for her relation to Christ. Men, brethren to her by nature, or hypocritical professors, brethren in name, were enraged at her, because of the favour shewn her, and her attachment to her beloved; and they had compelled her to endure the greatest hardships, and do the most unsuitable drudgery; and this, among other painful effects, had proved a temptation to her, to neglect, in some measure, her own duty, and the care of her soul, and thus had tended in every way to mar her comeliness.—It would have been very strange for king Solomon to introduce his favourite queen, speaking in this manner to her attendants. It has indeed been imagined, that Pharaoh's daughter, having early embraced the true religion, was persecuted for her religion by her brothers, and driven to the south of Egypt, where, by keeping the vineyards, she acquired a tawny colour, so that she neglected her own vineyard, that is, her beauty, or her fortune: and that Solomon, hearing of her piety and sufferings, sent for her and married her. A lively invention may easily thus make history or write novels: but the Scripture is silent. The whole is highly improbable. "Solomon made affinity with Pharaoh, and took Pharaoh's daughter." (1 Kings iii. 1.) This looks more like a political transaction between Pharaoh and Solomon, than such a marriage of vehement and disinterested affection, as the supposition implies.

V. 7. The spouse next addresses herself to Christ, as one desirous of distinguishing betwixt his holy rest and consolations, and the false peace and confidence of hypocrites. She requests to be instructed in what places he was used to feed his flock, and to shelter them from the noonday sun of persecution, or

'thou feedest, where thou makest thy flock to rest at noon: 'for why should I be as one that turneth aside by the flocks of thy companions?

8 If thou know not, 'O thou fairest among women, 'go thy way forth by the footsteps of the flock, and 'feed thy kids beside the shepherds' tents.

9 ¶ I have compared thee, 'O my love, 'to a company of horses in Pharaoh's chariots.

10 Thy cheeks are comely with rows of jewels, 'thy neck with chains of gold.

11 We will 'make thee borders of gold, with studs of silver.

temptation, that she might seek the same holy refuge; and not be tempted, or even appear inclined, to join those companies who follow corrupt teachers and hold erroneous tenets; who indeed profess to be the companions or friends of Christ, but are rather his rivals, and set up an interest in opposition to him.—'Weary of wandering uncertainly after those who pretend to thy Spirit, but mislead such as are guided by them.' (Bp. Patrick.)—'Whom thou hast called to the dignity of thy pastors, and they set forth their own dreams instead of thy doctrine.'

V. 8. It is evidently absurd to suppose this verse to be the language of the attendant virgins, or unestablished converts; who yet were able to instruct the spouse in her perplexity, and even to answer the request she had addressed to her beloved. No doubt the bridegroom is here introduced, as counselling his faithful spouse with an encouraging commendation of her spiritual beauty, as compared with the rest of Adam's fallen race. If she were at a loss, and feared lest she should mistake some company of hypocrites or heretics for his chosen children; she could not do better than to consider the examples of the most approved believers in the successive ages of the church, with the doctrines which they maintain; and to follow their steps, without regarding those who pretended to new discoveries, and taught opinions, either unknown in other ages, or condemned as heresy; and to mark such pastors, as simply kept the beaten track, the good old way; to attend on their ministry, with her children or young converts; and to instruct such as were put under her care according to their example.—The literal meaning of this, as applied to Pharaoh's daughter, is not especially stated by those who adhere to that mode of interpretation.

V. 9. Egypt was noted for beautiful and swift horses; those of Pharaoh's chariots would doubtless be the most excellent of the kind; and in their magnificent trappings would appear to the greatest advantage. This allusion therefore may mean, that in the judgment of Christ, believers are the excellent of the earth; and that the harmony which subsists among them, renders them peculiarly pleasant to him, and fitted to be the instruments of promoting his glory.—The simile, as applied to a beautiful female, though an instance or two not wholly unlike it may be found in ancient writers, seems not very apposite.—The Septuagint renders the words for a company of horses in 'the singular, my mare in Pharaoh's chariots; and some 'think that this is the meaning of the original.'

V. 10. The spiritual gifts and graces which Christ bestows upon his church and every true believer, and which render their professed faith, and their conversation among men ornamental and becoming, seem to be here described by the external ornaments then in use; and not without reference to the ornaments used in the harnesses of horses, especially in the royal chariots.

V. 11. This verse is generally supposed to be the reply of the attendant virgins, who thus engaged to prepare for the spouse the ornaments with which she was about to be decorated; but as the increase and perfection of the church's spiritual adorning is the gift and work of God, it may be doubted whether this is not to be considered in respect of the new creation, as in some respect similar to the remarkable words of the Creator, when about to form our first parents. (Note, Gen. i. 26.)

V. 12-14. The spouse here again speaks, "Whilst the King sitteth at his table," (or meets his people in those ordinances in which they feast with him,) her spikenard, or precious ointment, sendeth forth its smell: that is, the grace received from his fulness springs forth into lively exercises of faith, love, gratitude, and adoration, which are pleasant and honourable to him. Yet Christ himself, and not his gifts, are most precious to her; and she resolves to lodge him near, or in her heart, as a bundle of myrrh or other fragrant gums are laid in the bosom, all the night, or during the darkness and troubles of life. For Christ was to her far more precious and delightful than the most valued productions of the field or vineyard.—'The most precious nard cometh from the spikes of a very small contemptible shrub, which may be considered as an emblem of the sweet odour of the gospel, which with such mean and despicable persons as the apostles were in themselves, filled the whole world.' (Bp. Patrick.)—It is not certainly known what the word rendered camphire signifies, but it seems to have been some very costly perfume; and perfumes have always been immensely more in request in those Eastern regions, than they are present in this country, (Marg. Ref.)—The original word, however, signifies also an atonement; and some Jewish writers have rendered the clause, 'the man who propitiates all things,' with apparent reference to the Messiah.

V. 15. Here Christ again speaks, commending his beloved as fair; especially as having eyes like the dove, which are gentle, loving, and pure. This may imply her spiritual discernment, watchfulness, the purity and simplicity of her affection for him, and her mild and harmless conduct in the world.

V. 16, 17. Here the spouse answers, professing her admiring love and gratitude to the Saviour, and her delight in her union with him. By their bed or carpet being green, may be meant the efficacy of his ordinances, to render believers flourishing in holiness, and to convert sinners: and the beams of cedar and rafters of fir, may mean the stability of the new covenant, and the incorruptible nature of those mansions in which believers will dwell with their beloved for ever.—The Eastern nations generally sleep on carpets, and recline at meals on couches covered with them.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1-6. The things which are most intimately connected with the person and love of the divine Saviour, have supereminent excellency; for, communion with him in faith and love, is as the marrow of religion. They, who have tasted that he is gracious, long for renewed pledges of his kindness; and the more they experience of his peace and joy, the more fervent will be their desires. This sweet experience of his grace, gradually weans them from other objects, and disposes them to renounce all for his sake and at his command. The pleasures, which arise from the most exquisite gratifications of every sense, convey to the mind a very faint and inadequate idea of that delight with which the believer, in some favoured moments, contemplates the Redeemer's excellencies, and his love which "passeth knowledge." This renders the preaching of the gospel, the written word, prayer, praise, meditation, and christian conversation, so agreeable to him: then the name of Christ becomes "as ointment poured forth;" and the more the subject is discussed, the more glorious and lovely he appears. These are "joys with which a stranger intermeddeth not;" but every holy creature in heaven and earth loves the incarnate Saviour, in proportion to his love of the Father, and of his righteous law and holy service; and the further we are removed from all inordinate love of created objects, the more precious will Christ be to our hearts. But the more clearly we discern his glory, the more deeply sensible shall we be of our inability to follow him in a suitable manner; and at the same time the more desirous of doing it; thus experiencing "that we cannot do the things that we would," our prayers for the effectual drawings of his grace will become more fervent and frequent; and we shall not only desire to run after him ourselves, but to animate others to do the same. Every sweet season of near communion with Christ will endear him more to our souls, and increase our joy and gladness in his favour and worship; we shall recollect with regret the comforts that we do not at present possess, and long and wait for their renewal, even more than sensualists do for the return of their unsatisfying joys. Our honourable thoughts of Christ will ever be productive of lowly thoughts of ourselves, so that nothing will appear estimable or amiable in us, except as interested in his righteousness and partakers of his holiness; and these we shall deem more preferable comeliness than all the external glory which surrounded king Solomon. It is indeed lamentable that so many things should be visibly defective in the church; as they harden some in prejudices, and are stumbling-blocks to others. "Yet it must needs be, that offences come, but woe be to them by whom they come." We should therefore endeavour so to explain these subjects, as to prevent the effects of undeniable blemishes; and caution enquirers not to look on us, to form their judgment of Christianity, but on the example, precepts, and truths of Jesus, where they may view it uncorrupted. All that supposed deformity of the church, however, which results from want of wealth, learning, or secular power, or from her afflicted and persecuted condition, is in fact her glory and beauty; nay, the Saviour himself hath no form or comeliness to the carnal mind, that it should desire him.—But it seldom happens that we are much tempted or persecuted, without in some measure deviating from our duty; and without intermeddling with disputes, or employments, not properly belonging to us; thus Satan prevails with us to keep other men's vineyards and to neglect our own. And how dreadful is it, when those that should be labourers in the Lord's vineyard, are so taken up with worldly employments, as to neglect the care of their own souls, as well as the souls of those committed to them! Indeed, even such ministers as are busy in their proper work, should be very watchful over themselves; or their own vineyard will perhaps be worse tended than those of their hearers.

V. 7-17. If the Lord Jesus be indeed our beloved, we shall be greatly afraid of being drawn aside and imposed upon; and have frequent occasions to beseech him, as the great and good Shepherd, to guide us into his fruitful pastures and pleasant resting-places; nay, we shall fear even seeming to belong to those false teachers who beguile unstable souls, and draw away disciples after them, who pretend to be the friends, but in truth are the rivals of the bridegroom. If we seek his direction in order to follow it, he will express his approbation, and preserve us from delusion; he will guide us in the path that is beaten with the footsteps of his flock in every age; and satisfy us, that we are "followers of them, who through faith and patience inherit the promises;" he will shew such as humbly ask him, who are those pastors that he employs to feed his sheep and lambs; and he will teach them to attend on their instruction, and to bring their families to partake of it also, and to assist their weaker brethren in forming their judgment in these important matters.—The more humble and diffident of ourselves we are, the better will the Lord approve of us; he delights in the graces which he confers, and applauds the good that he enables us to do; he will perfect his own good work where it is truly begun; and continually add to the spiritual adorning of those whom he is beautifying with salvation. Communion with Christ transforms us into his image; the lively exercise of spiritual affections has a fragrance of the same kind with "the savour of his good ointments poured forth." But he himself is every thing to flourishing Christians; they desire that Christ may dwell in their heart by faith and love, and prepare them for himself by renewing them fully to his own likeness. The increase of this disposition renders them more and more the objects of his delight; and he especially approves of the meekness, purity, and holy love, which they derive from the dove-like Spirit of God. Thus the sacred flame is fanned and fed; and the soul daily having fellowship with the Father and the Son, by the Spirit, grows in holiness, and enjoys a lively hope of an incorruptible, undefiled, and unfading inheritance in the blessed world above. O Lord, visit our souls more and more with this salvation!

NOTES.

CHAP. II. V. 1, 2. It is most obvious to suppose that the bridegroom here speaks, and declares his own preciousness and condescending love. The rose is considered as the chief of flowers; and it is probable that Sharon was eminent for roses of beautiful hue and peculiar fragrance. Thus Christ, in his person, character, and mediation, combines every excellency in the highest degree; and is most delightful and refreshing to the souls of his people.—The lily, which adorns the lowly valleys, is an apt emblem of his humiliation in assuming our nature, and his lowliness of heart; and also of his dwelling and communing with the poor of this world, and the poor in spirit, in this vale of sin and sorrow; and likewise of his spotless purity. His church too is "as the lily among the thorns." "They that believe in Christ partake of his excellencies." (Bp. Patrick.) They cannot resemble him in his majesty or mediatorial excellency; but they do, in a measure, as to his lowliness and purity. Yet in this world they are like a lily surrounded, and crowded, and wounded, by worthless thorns; an emblem of the character of the wicked, their injuries to believers, and of their fitness for the fire of destruction. Christ describes his church under the emblem of a beautiful woman whom he hath espoused, and she describes him as one of the sons of men; and the rest of mankind are called "the daughters" and "the sons;" being indeed originally of the same family, but bearing a very different character, and having formed a contrary alliance.

V. 3. The spouse here speaks. The apple-tree (or citron-tree, as some suppose) is not so stately as the cedar or the fir tree, but its fruit is peculiarly valuable.—Christ appeared in exterior meanness, but that covered the most transcendent preciousness; and the fruits of his abasement and sufferings endear him to every believer, far above all the most admired characters in the world.—A traveller scorched by the noonday sun would gladly shelter himself under the branches of a spreading apple-tree, and refresh himself with its fruit. Thus the believer remembers seasons, when remorse of conscience, and fear of deserved wrath, with the temptations of Satan, and the injuries of the world, have dismayed or distressed him, and left him without any conceivable refuge, except that revealed in Christ Jesus. To this he fled with earnest desires, and under it he sat down, or sheltered himself; while the pardon and peace, that it afforded him, were delightful to his heart; and the consolations of the Spirit of adoption, as fruits from this tree of life, were sweet to his taste, in proportion to his former terror, humiliation, and affliction, and to the degree in which he was weaned from earthly objects. Some explain this of the true God, as pre-eminent above all the idols of the heathen; and of the comforts of true religion; but it is only in Christ that the true God is the refuge and comfort of sinners; and the simile is vastly more apposite, if applied to the Lord Jesus, in whom the carnal eye "sees no form or comeliness," but faith discerns every thing glorious and precious.

V. 4. The image is here varied. Christ is the author and finisher of our faith, as well as the ransom for our sins. He brings the soul to seek and enjoy those comforts, that are communicated through his ordinances, which are as a banqueting house where his saints feast with him. (Marg. Ref.) The standard being erected and the banner displayed, the soldiers resort to it, and by keeping near it perform their duty to their leader, and best consult their own safety. The love of Christ, manifested in his humiliation unto death, is the banner that he displays by his word. To this the believer resorts, and by it is directed and encouraged; and thus he obtains the benefits of salvation, is animated to resist every enemy, and finds effectual protection.

vision of guilt and danger, and preceded his peace and joy in believing. "The flowers" may denote the opening blossoms of holy affections and desires; "the time of the singing of birds" may mean his first grateful songs of praise; "the voice of the turtle," then first heard in the land, may signify the first comforts of the witnessing, sealing Spirit of God; "the green figs, and tender grapes" or buds, which are pleasant to the smell, represent the first immature fruits of righteousness, which promise a future valuable increase: and all these encouraging tokens and evidences of Divine favour, are employed as motives to the soul, to follow Christ more entirely. The passage may also be accommodated to the believer's renewed comforts, after a season of temptation and discouragement; to the renewed peace of the church, after sore persecutions; and to the completion of his happiness in heaven.

V. 14. Christ is still the speaker. The spouse, conscious of her unworthiness, and ashamed of her former sins and the imperfection of her present services, had hidden herself in the clefts of the rock, or in some retired place, as declining his gracious invitation. "Thou that art ashamed of thy sins, come and shew thyself unto me." In this is represented a mixture of humility and unbelief common in the experience of true believers. But Christ speaks to her, as his dove, gentle, harmless, loving, and faithful, and intreats her to come forth: for he took great delight in her, as a true penitent; he deemed her countenance comely, and was well pleased to behold it, and her voice sweet, and delighted to hear it, when employed in confession, prayer, and grateful praise.—Some, however, understand the verse, of the church (or believers,) fleeing from persecution, into the most retired places, (as the dove flies into the recesses of the rock from the birds of prey,) yet there encouraged to present her worship, as assured of the tender affection and gracious acceptance of her beloved, though despised and hated by the world. The faithful and loving dove is an apt emblem of the true church, as espoused to Christ; and by her conformity to him, through the sanctification of the Spirit, she is well-pleasing in his sight.

V. 15. The new convert had before been represented as a vine with tender grapes, (13); and the foxes, it seems, used to injure the vines and destroy the grapes by trampling on them, as well as the wild boars by devouring them. "I require all those, that act by authority from me...to use their early diligence to discover and confute the sophistry of deceivers, who craftily insinuate their false doctrines into weak and incautious souls, and thereby seduce those who are newly converted, and but infirm in the faith." (Bp. Patrick.)—False prophets are, by Ezekiel, compared to foxes; and in many particulars, false teachers and heretics resemble this artful creature. Yet the inroads they make on the church, and the destruction they occasion, seem too evident and formidable, to be described by young foxes; and those, who consider the verse, as exclusively a command of Christ to his servants to oppose heretics, appear reduced to some difficulty to exclude the idea of persecution. Perhaps, in general, it is a caution against every thing, however plausible, which tends to hinder the prosperity of the church and the fruitfulness of believers, and against heresy in particular. Whatever wastes time, squanders money, or engrosses a large share of attention, and tends to the neglect of the means of grace, is of this kind: and when the pursuit, or study, (such as music, painting, and many other things of the same nature,) is not directly criminal in itself; it spoils the vine, and mars its tender grapes, with the unsuspected subtlety of the fox. The first rising of sinful thoughts and desires, and the beginnings of those trifling pursuits, are like the little foxes, which if not taken will spoil the vines. Trifling visits, which waste much time, incur great expense, put the mind out of frame for devotion; and intrude on the hours that should be employed in meditation, self-examination, searching the Scripture, and secret prayer, are peculiarly injurious in this respect; and no good can arise from such unnecessary intercourse with worldly people or with superficial professors, whose company is still more prejudicial. Specious deviations from the truth, which make a little allowance for the pride, avarice, vanity, or indolence of our hearts, and admit of some measure of conformity to the world; and the discourse of those, who are ever asking, what harm is there in this, or in that? or, what need of this or that measure of diligence? are little foxes, which spoil the vines; and which must be taken, and removed out of the way, by private Christians and public teachers, who desire to be, or to see their people, fruitful branches of the living Vine. Even lawful and needful pursuits and recreations, when attended with excess or inexpediency, "choke the word, and it becometh unfruitful;" "for our vines have tender grapes."—This caution, (whether of the bridegroom, or the attendants,) must be allowed to come in very abruptly, if our attention be fixed on the external arrangement of a dramatical dialogue.

V. 16, 17. The spouse here again speaks, as one assured that Christ and all his blessings, are become her's by faith; of which her love to him, and her unreserved surrender of herself to be his, devoted to his service, in body and soul, formed the sure evidence; and she rejoices, in experiencing that he takes pleasure in visiting and communing with his people, who resemble him in lowliness and purity, and in feeding them in the green pastures of his ordinances; and she begs, that he will continue to favour her with those visits,

"till the day break, and the shadows flee away." This may refer to the shadows of the Jewish dispensation, which were dispelled by the breaking of the gospel-day, and the rising of the Sun of Righteousness; or to the darkness and shadows of our state on earth, which will shortly be changed for heavenly light and substantial felicity. The word Bethel signifies division; and may intimate the removal of every thing, which now divides our souls from him, and from the beatific vision.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1-7. The most distinct and apparently opposite excellencies centre in our divine Redeemer; and he appears as glorious in his deepest abasement and sufferings for us, and in his condescending communion with us, as in his essential majesty and holiness. His people also are excellent, in proportion as they are conformed to him; and the small degree, in which the meanest believer on earth resembles Christ, renders him more honourable and amiable, than the most accomplished unbeliever; even as the lily is preferable to the prickly thorn. We should, however, remember among whom we dwell, expect to be injured by them, and endeavour to suffer with meekness.—The believer, as his judgment matures, will admire the whole of the Redeemer's character: but he is commonly first attracted by perceiving the suitableness and preciousness of the fruits of his mediation. None of those eminent persons, whose characters and exploits are celebrated by historians, orators, and poets, can pretend to heal a wounded conscience or a broken heart; or to deliver a trembling sinner from the wrath of God and the power of Satan. They may be stately, as the cedars of Lebanon; but the lowly Jesus, whose merits and grace bring relief in the hour of deep distress, is unspeakably more lovely in the eyes, and precious to the heart, of the true Christian. Every time that he finds deliverance from guilt, fear, temptation, and distress, by faith in his name; and every experience of the sweetness of peace and joy in believing, and of the hope and comfort, which the Spirit of adoption communicates, increases his love to the Author of his eternal salvation.—Let us then come, and sit down under his shadow, and abide there; we shall find great delight in so doing, and his fruit will be sweet to our taste: for none despise these joys, but they that never experienced them, and who have no desire after them, through their eager pursuit of the vanities of the world. The Lord Jesus hath purchased the feast, and his ordinances are appointed, that we may in them partake of it; and the same love, which allures, and protects us in communing with him, animates us to venture and suffer for his sake; and with that banner before our eyes, or over our heads, we shall valiantly encounter and surely overcome all our enemies. In proportion as we relish heavenly consolations, our longings after them will increase; and earth would become intolerable to us, were we not stayed with those cordials and first-fruits of glory, until our course be finished. These we should earnestly seek for ourselves and for each other, that we may not faint through the troubles of our way. Even when our consolations do not abound, we have cause to acknowledge, that we have many gracious supports and unmerited mercies from the Lord's presence with us. Nor should we expect uninterrupted comfort on earth; for the Lord will, when he pleases, leave us to feel how miserable and helpless we should be without him: but it becomes us to be careful not to bring this trial on ourselves by sins and negligences, or to occasion it to others: for, as a small noise will drive away the timorous hart; so, a little misconduct will grieve the Spirit of God, and interrupt our spiritual consolations. We may therefore rather wonder that we have so many precious pledges of divine love, than that we so often mourn and are disconsolate, when we reflect on our own want of watchfulness and circumspection.

V. 8-17. If the Christian so longs for the Lord's manifested presence and love, and receives every intimation of it with such exultation; and if ancient believers so rejoiced in the prospect of his appearance on earth in our nature: how should we anticipate the complete salvation, which will come to our souls at the hour of death, and to our bodies also at the glorious resurrection! For these purposes our Redeemer will come quickly, and we shall soon be with him, and "see him as he is, and be like him," and share his glory. In the mean time, our mortal flesh, as a wall, intercepts our view of him: but his eye is upon us; and every glimpse, we have of him by faith, is intended to render us willing "to be absent from the body, that we may be present with the Lord." If we have experienced the blessed change which takes place in conversion; if we have obeyed the call of Christ, to arise and follow him, and to leave the world and sin behind, that we may enjoy his love; if we have thus found peace of conscience, and joy in the Holy Ghost; and if the blossoms and fruits, (though but tender and green,) of true holiness appear in our lives: we need not fear to follow him, through any trials and temptations; nor have we any cause to dread his last call by death, to arise, and come away to the full fruition of his love. Even the unripe fruits of holiness are pleasant unto him, whose grace hath produced them; and when we are humble and ashamed of our services, he will approve and commend them. But we should not allow unbelief to tarnish our self-abasement: our Lord accounts that countenance comely which is furrowed with tears of godly sorrow, and those prayers sweet which are the language of a broken heart; and the contrite and penitent are always welcome guests at his table and supplicants at his throne of grace, and should not decline his gracious invitations. Whilst we live here, our desire should be to bring forth plentifully the fruits of righteousness; and careful observers will perceive that the little despised foxes do more harm to the branches of the living vine, than the dreaded wood-boars. Plausible errors, trivial omissions, compliances, and indulgences, are more general hinderances to our progress and usefulness, than gross transgressions, or distressing temptations; and Satan and his emissaries do us more harm, as subtle unsuspected deceivers, than as furious persecutors. We should then watch against the first occasions and feeble beginnings of evil, and suppress the first risings of sinful inclinations; destroying the little foxes, before they become capable of important mischief. This circumspect conduct conduces greatly to our full assurance of hope; and when it becomes evident, that we love Christ and are his willing people, we shall be sure that he is our loving Saviour. He will also delight in us, as the lilies that he hath planted; and we shall be solaced with his gracious visits, and wait in humble patient hope, till these earthly shadows flee away, and he come swiftly over every separating mountain, to take us home unto himself.

NOTES.

CHAP. III. V. 1-5. The circumstances of this narration, (and of one in some respects similar in the fifth chapter,) are so improbable, if applied in the literal meaning, to the newly-espoused queen of king Solomon, that to evade the difficulty, and to maintain the consistency of a dramatic poem, on occasion of Solomon's marriage, it has been considered merely as a dream of the spouse. But the narrative gives no intimation of this, so that the supposition only cuts the knot, which it was not found easy to loose.—Some interpreters suppose that the spouse seeking her beloved "by night, on her bed," denotes a season of darkness and drowsiness, of dim apprehensions, languid affections, and heartless services. Others accommodate it to a season of affliction. 'The church, by night, that is, in troubles, seeketh to Christ, but is not immediately heard.' But perhaps solitude and retired meditation are principally intended; as David "remembered God on his bed, and meditated on him in the night-watches," which showed the fervency of his love.—Yet, the circumstance of the spouse not finding her beloved, till she sought him in another manner, gives some ground to the opinion, that a degree of slackness and self-indulgence was intended. Being, however, uneasy at her ill-success, she was excited to more decided endeavours to recover the comforts of communion with him. "The streets, and broad ways of the city," seem rather to imply earnestness in all the means of grace, in which the Lord is to be sought, than to mark the distinction between public, social, and private duties. Thus she is represented as seeking her beloved in every part of the city. But still she did not succeed for a time, for she was further to be humbled, proved, and quickened.—She therefore next applied to the watchmen that went about the city, who in this place denote the prophets and faithful ministers who could give proper directions to distressed souls, and earnest enquirers after the Saviour. But upon opening her case to them, and enquiring whether they had seen, and could direct her to her beloved, she did not receive any immediate satisfaction. This may intimate, that we must not rest in any means, but by faith apply immediately to Christ, if we would succeed with him. At length, however, perhaps through their direction and counsel, she found her beloved, "and then she held him, and would not let him go," being afraid of losing the comfort of his presence, "until she had brought him into her mother's house," &c. The church at large may be called the mother of believers; the public ordinances are the chambers in which they are conceived and born of God; and the spouse bringing her beloved into this house and these chambers, may signify the believer's open profession of his faith, and joining himself to the Lord and his people; with a declaration, expressed or implied, of his intention to walk with them in love or holy obedience. This was done of old by those who were born Jews, and circumcised in infancy, in a constant attention to all their sacrifices and sacred solemnities: and the Lord's supper especially answers this purpose to Christians.—The spouse being now happy in communion with Christ, renews the charge before given to the daughters of Jerusalem, or Christ renews it respecting the church, for expositors are not agreed on this point. (Note, ii. 7.)

V. 6. These seem to be the words of the daughters of Jerusalem, expressing their admiration at the zeal and fervent love of the spouse. They enquire "who this is, that cometh out of the wilderness?" perhaps alluding to the wilderness through which Israel passed, and from which they went up to possess the promised land. But a wilderness is a known emblem of this vain world: the believer comes out of it, when he renounces its friendship, and is delivered from the love of it; and when he leaves its sinful pleasures and pursuits, and refuses compliance with its customs and fashions, that he may seek happiness in communion with God, through Jesus Christ. "Pillars of smoke" ascended towards heaven, whilst the sacrifices were consumed on the altar of burnt-offering; and sweet gums and spices of the merchant were burnt upon the golden altar of incense. This may represent the lively affections, and fervent prayers and praises, and other spiritual sacrifices, of believers, ascending to heaven before God, through the atonement and intercession of Christ.—The last clause may be rendered, "more precious than all the powders of the merchant."

V. 7, 8. The spouse seems to call on her companions, not to admire her feeble graces and imperfect services, but to behold her beloved. As the bed and bedchamber of Solomon was guarded by a number of well-armed soldiers, lest he should be disturbed or assaulted in the night; so a guard of angels continually protects the church from the assaults and terrors of her enemies, in the darkest hours, whilst she maintains communion with her beloved; yea, the Lord himself is her keeper by day and night. 'Behold the love, which the great King hath to her, having prepared all things for her reception into society with himself; of whose royal person and happiness, Solomon himself, in all his glory, is but a figure.—Valiant persons encompass him night and day, but not comparable to the power and multitude of that heavenly host which secure the church in her enjoyments, and take care of her safety.' (Bp. Patrick.)—This supposes the verse to be a continuation of the admiring language used by the daughters of Jerusalem, concerning the zeal and happiness of the spouse.

V. 9, 10. Here again Solomon is the type of Christ, the king of Israel, and our Prince of peace. The chariot of cedar, or open carriage, which Solomon had made for himself, may mean the gospel of Christ, or the everlasting covenant which he hath mediated in our behalf, in which his glory and our felicity are united; the silver pillars may denote the precious promises and engagements, which are the support and ornament of this covenant, and the security of all believers; the bottom of gold, and the covering of purple, may mean the rich blessings and royal privileges conferred on every true believer; and the midst thereof, paved with love, shews that all these blessings spring from the love of God in Christ Jesus to fallen sinners, "according to the eternal purpose which he hath purposed in himself," and centre in it.—The clause rendered, "for the daughters of Jerusalem," may mean "by or from the daughters of Jerusalem." Solomon's carriage was adorned by their needlework, and the figures, whatever they were, wrought by them, no unapt emblem of Christians "adorned the doctrine of God their Saviour in all things."
